THE REVIEW OF THE TROOPS BEFORE KING ALEXANDER I. AT ZAITCHA, SERVIA—THE MARCH PAST OF THE INFANTRY

LANDING AT THE APOLLO BUNDER, BOMBAY-PRINCE ALBERT VICTOR SETTING FOOT ON INDIAN SOIL FOR THE FIRST TIME

PRINCE ALBERT VICTOR IN INDIA

Mr. GLADSTONE TALKS .--- To persons unaccustomed to public speaking it may seem a wonderful feat for a man verging on fourscore to pour forth such a flood of words as Mr. Gladstone emitted during two successive days at Manchester. But to him probably this display causes no more effort (provided he can keep his voice in working order) than does a gentle "constitutional" to any healthy man of his own age. When, however, we attempt to appraise the substantive value of all this oratory, we must not be too critical. The English people are wonderfully lenient in their judgment of old public favourites. When, for instance, a veteran public singer betrays the infirmities of advancing years by his (or her) quavering notes, the kind-hearted audience applaud vigorously, remembering the voice that was, and graciously ignoring the voice that is. But it is scarcely possible fully to take this charitable view regarding Mr. Gladstone's recent efforts, because amid his evident decrepitude there is manifested so much malice. On Tuesday, for instance, he emptied the vials of his wrath on the heads of the Liberal Unionists, accusing them of hindering all legislation of a genuinely Liberal character, whereas everybody (including Mr. Gladstone himself) is perfectly well aware that the presence of the Liberal-Unionists in the Tory Camp has spurred the Cabinet on to attempt various reforming measures which it would otherwise have gladly left in abeyance. As for the eternal Irish Question, Mr. Gladstone's references to it, beside being poor and unsatisfying, were grossly unfair. He now charges the Conservatives with all the alleged wrongs which Ireland has endured since the Act of Union was passed, quietly ignoring the fact that for some fifty years of that time one William Ewart Gladstone was in power either as a Member of Parliament or as a Cabinet Minister, and that he never raised his voice in what Daniel O'Connell or Mr. Parnell would describe as the accents of a true Irish patriot until three years ago, when his sudden change of front looked uncommonly like a desperate effort to regain office at the cost of apostatising from all his previous beliefs respecting Irish policy.

MR. BALFOUR'S FALSE START. Mr. Balfour is to be congratulated on the way in which he has withdrawn from the position he rashly adopted with regard to Roman Catholic University education in Ireland. He claims that he had no other purpose than to secure for Irish Roman Catholics the kind of University training they professed to desire; but it is not uncharitable to suppose that he was rather pleased by the idea that in trying to attain this object he might be able to create dissension between the Gladstonian and the Parnellite Home Rulers. As we, however, with others, warned him at the time, he was playing with a double-edged weapon; and this he speedily discovered for himself. It soon became manifest that if he attempted to give effect to his proposal he would cause at least as much discord among the Unionists as among the Home Rule party. In these circumstances the wisest course for him to take was to acknowledge frankly that-as Mr. Courtney has put it-he had made a false start; and in his speech at Partick the other day, with his usual courage and honesty, he admitted that it would be impossible for him to advance further towards the goal he had hoped to reach. His personal convictions on the subject are unchanged. He still thinks that what he calls the most generous policy would be the best policy. But he holds that the problem of Irish University education can be dealt with only if three conditions are complied with. Any proposal that may hereafter be made must be cordially accepted by Irish Roman Catholics as a settlement of the question; it must not be used by any party in Parliament as a means of inflicting a political blow upon its opponents; and Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Irishmen must agree generally in demanding that the proposal shall become law. It is not to-morrow or the day after that these conditions will be fulfilled, and we may safely assert that, as long as they are insisted upon, we shall hear very little about the subject of an Irish Roman Catholic University.

THE SOCIALISTIC MILLENNIUM.—It would appear that the Socialist leaders' heads must be slightly turned by their late brilliant successes against capital. Mr. Champion does not usually indulge in dreams; there is a hard practicality in the counsel his paper offers to working-men, which has little flavour of the visionary. Nor does he seem to be one of the Theodore Hook species, with an irresistible longing for practical jokes. We must attribute, therefore, his amusing letter on labour politics to a state of temporary exaltation consequent upon so many, and such great, victories. He pictures to himself-and coolly asks Mr. Gladstone to help him to realise the Utopian conceptiona state of society in which superabundance of labour would be prevented by the simple process of dividing and subdividing employment. He and his colleagues abjure emigration as a device of the enemy; they also disclaim charity. What they demand is that the State should by legislative enactment forbid labour for more than a specified number of hours per diem. Mr. Champion does not pretend, as some have done, that the same amount of work would be done in the shorter time as is now done in the longer. Were that the case, the unemployed would derive no benefit at all. It is to secure constant employment for them that he advocates the eight hours limitation. And so it might do for a time, provided that the working-classes were willing to accept a proportionate reduction of wages. On that head, Mr. Champion is discreetly silent, but certain passages in his manifesto seem to show that, when his millennium arrives, the British workman will have more money to spend than he has at present. Even assuming, however, that lower wages were accepted, we should be no nearer finality than we are now. With emigration at a standstill, the population would increase faster than ever, throwing more and more labour into the market, and thus necessitating successive contractions of the hours of toil to provide work for the unemployed. And so, at last, the working-man would have next to nothing to do, and next to nothing to receive at the week's end.

PRESIDENT HARRISON'S MESSAGE.—As befits a peaceful and prosperous State, this Message, judging by the summary, contains nothing of surprising interest. As Mr. Harrison observes that Canada has administered the fisheries during the past season without friction, it is to be hoped that the troubles of the seal-catchers in Alaskan waters will be settled in such a manner that while the monopoly enjoyed by the A'aska Company is safe-guarded within its proper boundaries, it will not be extended to waters which are beyond its jurisdiction. It is not likely that the monarchies of Europe will be in too great a hurry to acknowledge the newly-hatched United States of Brazil when the oldest and incomparably the most powerful Republic on the American Continent prudently means to wait until the majority of the Brazilian people signify their adhesion to the new order of things. Decidedly the most interesting, and at the same time to Europeans the most tantalising, item in President Harrison's State Paper is the Surplus, that terrible nightmare which sits on the bosom of American statesmen. How envious it makes us poor over-burdened inhabitants of the Old World feel! Each of us is ready to exclaim, like the cabman contemplating the drunk and incapable gentleman on the pavement, "I only wish I'd 'arf his complaint!" The American "complaint," that is to say, the excess of revenue over expenditure, amounted last year to 57,000,000 dollars, and this year to 44,000,000. The puzzle is what to do with the Surplus. Pensions are granted most liberally, and although it is proposed to increase the navy, improve the coast defences, and subsidise ocean mail steamers, still this blessed Surplus goes on accumulating. Of course there is a very simple way out of the difficulty. Recast the Customs Tariff on Free Trade principles. But as Mr. Harrison was elected on the Protectionist ticket, there is no chance of such a change, and therefore, during the present administration, Americans must travel along with this enviable burden on their backs.

French Peasants and French Politics.---It used to be thought in Paris that the political opinions of the French peasantry might be safely neglected. It was assumed that any important proposal which commended itself to the judgment of the Parisians would commend itself to that of the peasants also. This assumption was rather rudely shaken by the results of the last General Election. Paris was unmistakably favourable to the claims of General Boulanger, but the peasantry as a class declined to have anything to do with him. They were not particularly enthusiastic about the Republic, but, upon the whole, it seemed to them better than a Dictatorship, and so they sent to the new Chamber a majority strong enough to maintain existing institutions. The consequence is that the various parties are beginning to compete eagerly with one another for peasant support. Thanks to the labours of M. Kergall, an enthusiastic young Breton, an Agricultural League has been formed for the purpose of impressing upon deputies the necessity for a practical, moderate, and progressive policy; and now both the Right and the Lest are organising "Agricultural Groups," whose business will be to take care that peasant voters are not wantonly offended. The movement is one of genuine importance, and the best French statesmen will do what they can to strengthen it, for the influence of the peasantry, if persistently exerted, would certainly tend to give vigour and steadiness to Republican policy. The peasantry have shown that extreme measures are repugnant to them, and that what they want is a political system around which all men of good sense might be willing to rally. They have the power, if they choose, to give effect to their wishes, and the fact that they are awakening to a sense of their responsibilities is one of the most promising signs of the times in France.

VOLUNTEER COMMISSIONS.—It is getting to be a serious matter that so many commissions in the Volunteers should go a begging. Owing to the limited amount of training they have time for, our citizen soldiers have more need of officers than the Regulars. When the force was first established, and for a good many years afterwards, candidates for commissions were never lacking. But a change has gradually come over the whole body. While its military prestige has steadily increased, its social prestige has concurrently diminished, and whereas young gentlemen of means used to be quite common in the ranks, now only a very few care to accept commissions, That being the unpleasant fact with which we have to deal, the first thing to be done is to accept it as the basis for new methods and new arrangements. There are plenty of men in the ranks who would make excellent officers-full of zeal, smart drills, fully qualified in every respect. But they would not accept commissions if they had the offer, on account of the additional expense involved. Do away with that drawback, and numbers will come forward readily enough. Unfortunately, among not a few commanding officers there is a disposition to regard the commissioned grades as a separate caste, and to keep them so. Consequently, instead of endeavouring to minimise the expense incidental to an officer's position, they maintain the old tradition that any one aspiring to fill it must be willing to be placed under constant contribution. There is no occasion whatever why the expenditure of a Volunteer officer should be larger, apart from the higher cost of his uniform, than that of the sergeant or private. It is merely custom that appoints him a sort of paymaster-general, and until that idea is banished, very few eligible men will care for promotion to commissions. In such a thoroughly democratic force as the Volunteers, superior efficiency should be the sole qualification for the position of an officer. It is not so at present, by any means, but very much the contrary.

TYPHOID AND OTHER ZYMOTIC DISEASES. Just now, when influenza prevails as extensively in St. Petersburg as it did in London in 1847, one would like to feel sure that our modern sanitary appliances are always as conducive to health as they are presumed to be. In some respects there have been great improvements during the last fifty years. There is less over-crowding, less downright personal filth, and, above all-at all events in large towns-a more abundant and purer supply of water. A signal proof of this is that typhus, a typical disease of dirt and poverty, which was once common enough, is now rare. Weeks often elapse without one death being caused by it in London. But, on the other hand, typhoid, which used to be confused with typhus, but is now more correctly re-named enteric fever, has become much more prevalent of recent years; and it is a curious fact that it avoids the stuffy and crowded abodes of squalor and want, preferring to seek its victims among the comfortable Of course, this immunity of the poor may be due to the fact that they are already, on the Pasteur principle, so saturated with the typhoidal poison that they are unsusceptible to a degree of infection which would kill a new-comer. In cases of typhoidal disease, the drainage is generally blamed, as at Dublin Barracks, but we do not remember that any definite defects were discovered there. Recently it seems that many members of the London Stock Exchange have suffered from this malady, and the City Medical Officer of Health attributes the mischief to the noxious exhalations arising from the sewer ventilating shafts. There may be something in this theory. It is plain that the more perfect the network of underground drainpipes is in any city, the more scope there is for any infective matter deposited in these receptacles to spread its poison over the whole sewage-area. Cairo, we observe, is about to provide itself with 240 miles of sewers, at the cost of half-a-million sterling. We are by no means sure that in that hot, dry climate the system of daily removal of human and other refuse by carts (as practised in Florence) would not be both cheaper and healthier.

DINNERS FOR CHILDREN AT BOARD SCHOOLS.—A week or two ago we called attention to the fact that an influential meeting had been held for the purpose of organising the various agencies which seek to provide food for starving children at the London Board Schools. We are glad to say that the Committee appointed by the meeting has lost no time in taking steps for the accomplishment of its task. The London Schools Dinner Association has been formed; and the Self-Supporting Penny Dinners Council, the South London Schools Dinner Fund, the Poor Children's Aid Society, and other agencies of a like kind, have already agreed to allow their work to be merged in that of the new Society. Other organisations, while preferring for the present to maintain a separate existence, have undertaken to work in harmony with the central Association. Much, therefore, has been done, and we have no doubt that all the Societies engaged in this excellent enterprise will soon be labouring together under a proper system of control. What is now wanted is that charitable persons shall adequately support the Association in its efforts. An appeal has been addressed to the public by the Committee, and it ought to meet with a prompt and liberal response. It has been proved that every day many thousands of children who go to London Board Schools suffer the pangs of hunger. How can we expect that these poor young creatures will profit by the exertions of their teachers? It is cruel to ask them to do work for which they are physically unfit, and which, if they are compelled to do it, must in a large number of cases lay the seeds of disease. If they are to be educated, they must be fed; and the best way to feed them is to place the necessary means at the disposal of an Association composed of men and women who thoroughlyunderstand the need with which they propose to deal. Any one who gives money for this object may feel assured that it will be wisely expended, and we trust that very many of our readers will at once communicate with the Secretary, at the offices of the London School Board, Victoria Embankment, W.C.

RUSSIAN PETROLEUM. There never was a fairer game of tit-for-tat than when Russia, after having a large portion of her wheat-trade filched from her by the United States, hit the American oil-trade hard by opening the wonderful petroleum district near Baku. Between the two, the price of the article has been forced down so low that only moderate profits are now reaped, where huge fortunes used to be piled up. In the meantime, both are exhausting their supplies, and, should the demand continue to grow, a moderate number of years may suffice to see the end of their The Times correspondent who is now en route to Persia gives some facts pointing to the conclusion that the Baku region is not so prolific as it was two or three years ago. It appears that the supplies near the surface are already used up, thus necessitating very deep borings, with a consequent increase of expense. In some cases the pumping-wel's have to be carried down more than 1,000 feet, but the average depth is between 500 and 600 feet. Yet the firms engaged in the industry appear to be confident of being able to carry it on at a profit for a considerable time; and even should the area now being worked run dry, there are, it is believed, equally prolific districts kept in reserve by the Russian Government. In any case, England can comfort herself with the recollection that in some parts of her Empire petroleum exists in incalculable quantities. It has been found on the North-West frontier of India, in Burmah, and in Australia. But Mr. Marvin, who lately issued an instructive pamphlet on the subject, regards New Zealand as the destined oil-reservoir of the British Empire. Curious it is that John Bull should be so indifferent to these potentialities of wealth beyond the dreams of avarice. While the United States and Russia are pumping up petroleum as if their very existence depended upon making instant use of the oil, England remains supine, and spends her spare millions on gold-mining. Perhaps it may be just as well for her to remain passive: should the Russian and American fields dry up, she will get a much better price for any oil she may have in store.

STATISTICS OF THE DOCK STRIKE. --- In the annals of fabour contests this movement will ever be memorable as the parent of all the subsequent disputes between employers and employed which have since engrossed so much public attention. How far the agitation has really benefited the "casual docker," on whose behalf the crusade was ostensibly begun, can perhaps scarcely be decided at present. Our impression is that the tendency of the concession made by the dock companies, wharfingers, and others has been to benefit the permanent labourers at the expense of the casuals. Of course, in such a business as discharging cargoes, where a period of quiet is followed by a sudden rush of work, chance labourers will be needed at times, but employers will not trust so much as formerly to such candidates for a job. If our surmise should prove correct, this comparative cessation of casual dock-work may not prove a bad thing in the long run, though it may press severely during the present winter on a good many poor fellows. The balance-sheet of the moneys received and expended by the Strike Council seems fairly satisfactory, but we should like to have been told how the 12,000% which the Finance Committee had in hand after settling all disbursements dwindled down to 3.500%, which latter sum has been handed over to the Dockers' Union. As regards the sources from which the funds—in all about 48,000/.—were derived, the figures are suggestive. The general public contributed about 13,000/.; the Trades' Unions and Societies about 4,500/., foreign countries sent 108L, of which the United States of America contributed the munificent sum of 291. os. 4d., while Australia (which really chiefly means Victoria) sent no less than 30,000%! In fact, but for this liberal subsidy from one corner of the Antipodes, it is probable that the Dockers' demonstration would have col'apsed.

GREEK TROUBLES .--- M. Tricoupis seems to be bent on driving his country along the road that leads to financial in in. The commercial classes are already greatly overtaxed, and now he proposes to add to their burdens by a heavy increase of the duties on imports generally. Modern Greece has never been to any considerable extent a manufacturing country; the energies of her population are devoted chiefly to agriculture. Consequently she has to import largely commodities which are regarded as necessaries of life, and, if the prices of these commodities are artificially taised, the change will produce much real hardship. Industry and trade, too, will be discouraged, and capital will seek for itself outlets in countries where its operations will be less seriously hampered. If the proposals of M. Tricoupis were essential to the welfare of the nation, the Greeks would, of course, have no alternative but to let him have his way. But there is no necessity for these new import duties. The only object of M. Tricoupis in proposing them is to secure that Greece shall have a comparatively powerful army and navy. These are luxuries which the country can very well do without. The time may perhaps come when it will be expedient for Europe to allow Crete to be annexed to the Hellenic Kingdom, but that time has not come yet; and even when it does come, we may doubt whether the Greek Army and Navy will play a very prominent part in the settlement of the question. The task to which Greek statesmen ought chiefly to devote themselves is the development of the industrial and commercial resources of their country, and the first step that should be taken in that direction is the passing of a law providing for the diminution of naval and military expenditure. Tax-payers might thus obtain some immediate relief, and a fresh impetus would be given to trade. Politically, the Greeks would lose nothing by this policy, for they will most readily obtain new territory by convincing the Powers that they know how to use wisely that which they already possess.

PROTECTION OF FUR SEALS. Professor Flower sounds a note of alarm which will flutter many a gentlewoman. He foresees the time when, whether the Behring Sea question be settled one way or another; sea'skin will become a thing of the past. It is the old, old tale of human greed killing the goose that laid the golden eggs. Even as elephants are becoming scarce in Africa, and would have been extinguished in India before this but for State interference, so the furseal has vanished from numbers of places where it used to be abundant. A sad story, truly, and not reflecting much credit on those "hunters of the sea" who have brought it to pass. Yet, after all, they are not so much to blame as the several Governments for not long ago taking joint protective action. The captain of a sealer naturally argues that if he spares any of the animals that come in his way, the next ship will be sure to pick them up. Since, therefore, his one object is to secure the best cargo, he slays all he can, probably comforting himself with the reflection that by the time the last seal is shot his sealing days will be over. Would it not be possible to re-establish fur-seal colonies-or rookeries," as they are technically called—at the places which have been so remorselessly devastated? ostrich feathers became scarce by reason of the wholesale destruction of the wild birds, the Cape people hit upon the happy idea of starting ostrich farms. Of course, there is a vast difference in the case of a creature that lives in the sea. It would seem possible, nevertheless, that if some unfrequented littoral in a congenial climate-say that of the Falkland Islands—were colonised and strictly preserved, some good might result. As Professor Flower shows, the case of the still-flourishing "rookeries" on the Prybilof Islands in Behring Sea proves that seals, like cattle and sheep, can be made commercially profitable by a moderate amount of pro-They must have freedom to roam in quest of tection. food, and a safe breeding place. Granted these two boons, and the fur-seal does not much mind having his family thinned out from time to time for the benefit of humanity.

KING ALEXANDER REVIEWING THE SERVIAN TROOPS

TROOPS

Thursday, July 2nd, was a busy day for the little King of Servia, for on that day he was duly anointed by the Metropolitan Michael. The ceremony, which began at nine o'clock in the morning, took place in the half-ruined church of Zaitcha, near Kraljevo, which is chiefly remarkable for some fine mediæval frescoes which the Turks have done their best to spoil by scratching out the eyes of the kings and saints portrayed. After an address from the Metropolitan, and the infamous chanting of a Litany by a poorly-trained choir, the King recited a Credo, and then bared his chest. The Metropolitan anointed him with holy oil from Jerusalem on breast, hands, and forehead, and proclaimed him, amid the thunder of cannon, King of Servia. The service and congratulations over, a pleasanter task awaited the young King, who, like most boys, is fond of soldiers. In a meadow outside the church were several companies of troops. The King, surrounded by the Regents, military officers, and other important visitors, not least of whom was the Czar's envoy, M. Persiani, took his stand in a small kiosque which had been erected in the meadow, and which served as a saluting point. The troops, who are a fairly fine body of men, although, owing to inferior leadership, they cut up so badly against the Bulgarians in 1885, then marched past; and then, with a banquet at which 800 guests attended, the proceedings of this toil-some day came to an end.—Our engraving is from a photograph kindly sent us by Mr. A. Hulme Beaman, Hôtel Baimel, Belgrade.

PRINCE ALBERT VICTOR IN INDIA

some day came to an end.—Our engraving is from a pnotograpal kindly sent us by Mr. A. Hulme Beaman, Hôtel Baimel, Belgrade.

PRINCE ALBERT VICTOR IN INDIA

The Prince left London on board the P. and O. steamer Oceana (Captain Tomlin), at 2 P.M. on October 19th, and reached Bombay at 8 A.M. on November 9th (his father's birthday). Captain Tomlin had expected to meet some heavy currents after leaving Aden, and therefore telegraphed to say he should probably not arrive before 2 P.M. But the currents did not make their appearance, and therefore, as above-mentioned, the Oceana got in six hours before the appointed time. This excess of punctuality proved to be unfortunate, for the Prince landed as soon as possible, and the result was that he met with a very meagre reception. Out of seventy-two members of the Corporation only four or five were present, besides two Consuls, some ladies, some city Officials, and a few hundreds of people. There was, however, an imposing array of empty benches and glaring yellow chairs. The fact is, that the whole affair was hopelessly bungled, not by the Bombayese, who had made most elaborate preparations, but by the Prince's entourage, who allowed him to go ashore before the expected time. Surely it would have been no hardship for a vigorous young fellow like the Prince to stay on board a few hours longer rather than disappoint thousands of people of every caste and creed who were anxious to do honour to England's future King and India's Emperor in embryo. As it was, nine-tenths of these worthy folks did not arrive until the Prince had left, and merely saw the train which carried him off to Kirkee. And it should be remembered that the Hindoos attach an almost superstitious importance to the arrival of a Royal personage. An amusing instance of this occurred when the Prince landed from the steam-launch Bee at the Apollo Bunder. A group of Hindoos prayed devoutly that as he landed he might first place his right foot, and was theretenpon lustily cheered by the Horson of the Toth Hussars, dr

MR. T. A. WALKER

MR. T. A. WALKER

MANY vast projects are affected by the death on the 25th ult., at Mount Ballan, near Chepstow, of this well-known contractor. At the time of his death he had in hand the works of the Manchester Ship Canal, on which two millions sterling have already been expended, and the Harbour Work at Buenos Ayres, undertaken for the Argentine Government, and scarcely less important. Among other works constructed by Mr. Walker are the Severn Tunnel, in which enormous and unexpected difficulties were successfully met and surmounted, the Inner Circle Railway through London, the Barry Docks and Railways in South Wales, and the Prince of Wales' Docks at Cardiff. In fact, Mr. Walker had succeeded to the position held by the late Mr. Brassey, and might be described as the Napoleon of contractors. He leaves a widow and four daughters, and it is satisfactory to know that two of his sons-in-law will carry on the works at Buenos Ayres and Manchester.—Our portrait is from a photograph by A. Beattie, 51, Fishergate, Preston.

MR. WILLIAM ALLINGHAM

WILLIAM ALLINGHAM was born at Ballyshannon, County Donegal, March 19th, 1824. He died at Eldon House, Lyndhurst Road, Hampstead, November 18th, 1889. His father was a bankmanager at Ballyshannon, and was of English descent.

William Allingham was for many years in the Customs at Ballyshannon, in London, and elsewhere. About 1872 he finally quitted the Customs, and was for some years editor of Fraser's Magazine, in which had appeared his "Laurence Bloomfield," an able narrative poem, which offered a solution of the problem between the rich and poor in Ireland. In 1874 he married Miss Helen Paterson, the well-known artist, many of whose drawings and children to Witley, Surrey, and resided there until last year. Athenaum, and other literary periodicals. Already, in 1852, he was on terms of friendship with such men as Leigh Hunt, Tennyson, Carlyle, and Thackeray; but his most intimate friend was Dante G. Rossetti, whose friendship made Allingham a welcome guest in the gatherings of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood. It was in those early days that Rossetti, Millais, and Arthur Hughes illustrated his poems, and that he had these drawings cut on wood and printed. It is with these copies, so long and carefully preserved, that the dainty edition of his poetical works, on which he was occupied until within the last few weeks, is to be illustrated, and they should greatly enhance its value to collectors. Of this edition, in six volumes, Messrs. Reeves and Turner have already issued "Flower Pieces:" and "Life and Phantasy." The remaining four volumes—"Irish Songs and Poems." "Laurence Bloomfield." "Thought and Word," with Ashley Manor (a play), and "Blackberries"—will be issued by them in the spring. A great part of the poems in this edition are new, and those previously published have been revised.

It is a matter of regret to many of his friends that he has not included in his works his prose, for much of it (e.g., "Modern Prophets" and "A Chapter of Irish History") is not inferior to his poetry. He had read omnivorously, and had known personally the greatest literary men of his day.

MR. TUPPER

MR. TUPPER

MR. MARTIN FARQUHAR TUPPER, who died on the 29th ult, at his residence, Underhill, Norwood, was the son of a distinguishel medical man. Born in July, 1810, he was edu ated at Charterhouse, and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he once beat Mr. Gladstone in a theological prize-essay competition. An impediment in his speech prevented him frcm going into the Church, as he had intended, but did not hinder him from proceeding to the Bar; where, however, his practice was confined to drawing a will and a marriage settlement. He had already published two volumes of verse, when, in 1839, the first instalment of "Proverbial Philosophy"—a collection of brief apophthegms, something between poetry and prose, originally written for the benefit of the cousin whom he afterwards married—was given to the world. In spite of sneering reviews, the success of the book was enormous. The mild mixture of worldly wisdom and poetic language appealed to thousands of people. Edition after edition was called for, and a second, a third, and a fourth series were published, and taken up with equal avidity. Dr. Tupper gave his son 2,000/. as a token of his delight, and he is said to have made altogether some 10,000/. out of the book from first to last. Had there been international copyright between England and America, his receipts would have been multiplied tenfold. As it was, the million and a half copies sold in the States only brought him in some 80/l, though he made a good deal by the readings from his works which he gave on both sides of the Atlantic. He afterwards published many volumes, pamphlets, and even a play; but they none of them created much attention until, in 1836, appeared his autobiography, "My Life as an Author," which once more directed public attention to a writer who had influenced the minds of millions. Mr. Tupper, who was a Fellow of the Royal Society, married in 1835 Isabella, only daughter of Mr. A. W. Davis, by whom he leaves several children.—Our portrait is from a photograph by Negretti and Zumbra, Crysta

COSTUME BALL, GLASGOW

COSTUME BALL, GLASGOW

Avr., according to Robert Burns, is, or was, celebrated for "honest men and bonnie lasses;" my experience of Glasgow men is yet too limited to pass any opinion on them, but if the young ladies who were present at the ball are fair average samples of Glasgow beauty, Ayr will have a hard struggle to beat them. As it was an artists' costume ball the artists themselves turned out to a man, severely historical, and heroically tempted Providence in tights, &c., even when nature had been a little unkind, here and there, in the way of calves. But it was a night they had—a night to be proud of. Mr. J. Wright Robb, the hon. sec., was to be seen everywhere—generally in two or three places at once—attending to anything and everything. The committee, with their distinguishing little palette badges pinned on their doublets, were always ready and willing to show the way to the refreshments, and generally did their utmost to attend to the comfort of their guests. The event of the evening was "The Reel;" for it some six or eight pipers marched, as only pipers can march, into the hall, and, after a premarched, as only pipers can march, into the hall, and, after a premarched, as only pipers can march, into the hall, and, after a premarched, as only pipers can march, into the hall, and, after a premarched, as only pipers can march, into the hall, and, after a premarched, as only pipers can march, into the hall, and, after a premarched, as only pipers can march, into the hall, and, after a premarched, as only pipers can march, into the hall, and, after a premarched, as only pipers can march, into the hall, and, after a premarched, as only pipers can march, into the hall, and, after a premarched, as only pipers can march, into the hall, and, after a premarched, as only pipers and robe of the services. "THE NEW PRINCE FORTUNATUS"

CHILDREN are very unlikely to study diligently when their stomachs are empty, or nearly empty; and yet it is a sad fact that, owing to the poverty of the parents, a large percentage of the children who attend the Board Schools are in this lamentable conchildren who attend the are problem to relieve these poor little dition. It is not an easy problem to relieve these creatures without destroying the self-help of the parents, especially where, as in some cases, the family distress is due to unthrift or drunkenness; nevertheless, the problem has to be faced, and, on the whole, public opinion is in favour of feeding these children either by voluntary donations, or by the more systematic machinery of a rate. This latter plan has the advantage of compelling the selfish rate. This latter plan has the advantage of compelling the selfish rate. It is a superior of the string to contribute, as well as the kind-hearted and charitable, who often now give away far more than their fair share. Meanwhile, voluntary charity is doing much, as the following example will show. The Denmark Terrace Board School (where our artist made his sketches), the head master of which is Mr. Edmund Tipson, has among its scholars a very large proportion of very poor children. To meet their daily wants the managers and teachers have organised free dinners, which are given at noon to too children have organised free dinners, which are given thrice a week to over sixty children. A boot-fund has also been established, so that want of toots shall not be made an excuse for keeping children away from school. Much more could be done, and the above useful work from school. Much more could be done, and the above useful work from school. Much more could be done, and the above useful work received by the Hon. Treasurer, D. Cooksey, Esq., 52, Amwell Street, E.C. We may add, as a proof of the necessity of vigorous a tion being taken in this direction, that 6,000 children come treakfastless every morning to the Southwark Board schools, and that the funds of the local committee permit them at present to provide food for only 2,000. No doubt in other quarters the same sad condition of affairs exists.

AFTERNOON TEA ON BOARD A "P. AND O." STEAMER

AFTERNOON TEA ON BOARD A "P. AND O." STEAMER THE scene is off the City of Gondolas, and the time of year is the autumn, when the solar rays are no longer scorching, but only gratefully warm. We must, however, ask Mr. Melton Fisher one question. Where are the male passengers? Can it be that they are so dead to the fascinations of their fair messmates that, even on a balmy afternoon like this, they are congregated in the smokeroom playing "Nap?" We are loth to believe it, and yet, for some reason or other, they are conspicuous by their absence. There are seven ladies on deck, and their entertainment is entirely confided to a trio of P. and O. officers. From our own experience of these gentlemen, we know that they are, as sailors should be, both gallant and gallant, and therefore we can, as Mr. Fisher has, safely entrust the fair ones to their custody.

SURVEYING ON THE NEW GUINEA COAST

A NOCTURNE

A NOCTURNE

It was night-fall when the vessel approached the land, and the surveying party got their instruments in readiness to go ashore. As the moon rose, the sky, which had been overcast, cleared, the clouds gradually dispersed, and the stars shone out. As there was a bit of a swell on, some of the party narrowly escaped a ducking as they got into the boat alongside. The shore was plainly indicated by the white line of surf. As the boat's crew, after pulling gaily, drew near, the attention of the natives was attracted, and they came scampering down, looking uncommonly hostile in the distance. But they were really at that moment quite friendly, and gave valuable aid in hauling up the boat and collecting the various goods and chattels appertaining to the passengers. The instruments having been fortunately brought ashore without injury, preparations for taking an observation were at once begun. The natives were highly interested, and one of them inadvertently set his foot on and smashed the artificial horizon. Gradually they crowded round the survey-party, who found that remonstrances were vain, and, perceiving the threatening aspect of affairs, they decided to pack up their traps, and prepare for action or flight. Of these two alternatives, the latter was prudently selected, and many were the narrow escapes from stone clubs, lances barbed with bits of human hone, and "man-catchers." (These latter are spears with a canehoop at the end to put over the head of a flying foe.) At last the loat was regained, and, as the survey-party re-embarked, they retaliated with a volley or two. They finally got on board their ship, sans observations, wet through, and tired out.—The sketches are by a marine officer from notes by a lieutenant in the surveying party. The latter remarks: "The treacherous nature of the natives of New Guinea and the adjacent islands is past belief. They have been known to warn a white man, with whom they have been friendly at the time, not to turn his back to them in a canoe, lest they should lose c

THROUGH THE RANCHING COUNTRY

THROUGH THE RANCHING COUNTRY

When the Governor-General visited the ranching district we fully appreciated the utility of that splendid body of men—the North-West Mounted Police. His Excellency was entirely in their hands, the force providing our transport in teams or on horseback. Under Colonel Herchemer, who is executive commander of the force, the travelling over vast stretches of rough country was made pleasant and comfortable. Roughing it under the auspices of the mounted police in the North-West is simply a farce, and all the ladies of our party, looking bravely forward to a few hardships, I think eventually came to that conclusion. For prairie work, the mounted police discard their uniform of bright red and their neat little forage caps, and take to a tunic of brown jean, cartridge-belt, and cowboy hat. They carry their carbines across the high pommel of their Mexican saddles, and I think altogether, no finer, smarter, or picturesque body of men can be seen anywhere.—F. V.

HARNESSED DOGS IN HOLLAND

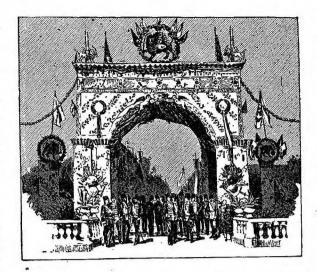

OLD Lon loners can remember the time when dogs harnessed to small carts were frequently to be seen about the streets. The practice of thus using dogs for draught purposes was forbidden by Act of Parliament in London in 1839, and in the rest of the United Kingdom in 1854. This measure was chiefly carried by the persistent efforts of Mr. Martin, an Irish M.P., who had noticed that these dogs were often ill-used, and who maintained, moreover, that the soft foot of the dog (unlike the hoofs of ordinary draught animals) is unfitted for travelling on hard roads. It may be that on the Continent the sufferings of the lower animals are less regarded than with us; at all events, in Germany, Belgium, and Holland harnessed dogs form all events, in Germany, Belgium, and Holland harnessed dogs form a common street sight, and in Germany mats are carried, so that the dogs may rest upon them during their rounds. Some people are now of opinion that the benevolent legislation of fifty years ago was a mistake; and that the cruelty inflicted on the costermonger, who was deprived of the services of an intelligent and inexpensive assistant, exceeded the benefit conferred on the dogs which were released from this labour. As brutality and ill-usage are far more released from this labour. As brutality and ill-usage are far more stringently repressed than they were fifty years ago, it is worthy of consideration whether dogs would really suffer if Martin's Act were repealed.—Our engravings are from photographs sent to us by Major-General Robley, and taken by H. Delathouwer, Shoe-Market, Antwerp.

ARRIVAL OF THE SHAH OF PERSIA AT TEHERAN

On Saturday, October 28th, His Majesty the Shah, after his prolonged sojourn in various European countries, made his formal entry into Teheran. Having left the world of locomotion and steam behind him at Tiflis, he journeyed from that point by caravan, making easy stages via Tauris and Casbine. Beautiful autumnal weather prevailed on the day of his arrival at Teheran The streets and houses were dressed with flags, and several triumphal arches (of one of which we subjoin an engraving) were erected along the route over which the procession was intended to pass. The city was en fêle, and the people gave their popular Sovereign an enthusiastic welcome.—Our engravings are from photographs sent by Mr. D. Morel, of Teheran.

Note.—Our engraving of the arrival of the German Emperor at Venice in our issue of November 23rd was from a sketch by Mr. Reginald Barratt, not a photograph, as stated in the accompanying article.

Political.—In the first of Mr. Gladstone's two speeches at Manchester, on Monday and Tuesday, he dealt with general topics; the second was devoted almost entirely to the Irish Question. The speech of Monday was more noticeable for what he did not, than for what he did say. Those of his followers who expected from him emphatic declarations on the questions which occupy their minds may have been disappointed. A passing reference to them was all that was made, and on the subject of an Eight Hours Bill, Mr. Gladstone preserved a profound silence. Perhaps it was a consciousness of this disappointment that led him to encourage the most advanced of his Liberal allies by saying, episodically, on Tuesday, that the secession of the Liberal Unionists, of whom, on both days he spoke with remarkable bitterness, had given "a great impulse and large increase of scope within the party to what are called Radical opinions." But, on the whole, it might have been inferred from his Monday's speech that he considered the extension of taxing and licensing powers to County Councils and the establishment of district and even parochial Councils to be, next to the settlement of the Irish Question, the most pressing of political needs. His speech of Tuesday on that question contained little or nothing that was novel. He took not the slightest notice of the challenge to disclose his altered Home Rule policy, though the fresh vigour of his denunciations of the Union and his denial that it had conferred any benefits on Ireland hmay have been intended as a hint to the Parnellites that he is prepared to go further than before in both a theoretical and practical recognition of Irish independence. He made the not unimportant admission that "Ireland generally is tranquil and happy," but, of course, attributed this improvement, not to the happy," but, of course, attributed this improvement, not to the happy," but, of course, attributed this improvement, not to the policy of the Government, but to the hope which he happened to the policy of the Rom stonians and the Parnellites.

LABOUR AND WAGES.—The Strike Council held its last meeting on Tuesday. Their surplus, about 3,500%, was handed over to the Dockers' Union. Their total expenditure has been above 40,000%, and in a manifesto just issued by the Council they state that the amount disbursed in relief covered at least a quarter of a million of people.—A Shop Hours League has been formed in London, one of the objects of which is to procure by legislative enactment a twelve hours' day and a weekly half-holiday at two o'clock.—There is about to come into operation an order issued by the Post Office authorities, raising from 16s. to 18s. a week the wages of young men joining the service as postmen in the London district.

A FIRE of some intensity broke out early on Tuesday morning in the well-known structure, IoI, Queen Victoria Street, City, the head-quarters of the Salvation Army. Considerable damage was done to it, and in a less degree to one or two of the adjoining buildings, but the immense quantity of water poured on the flames from nine steamers and the City hydrants, half-an-hour after the outbreak, prevented them from spreading further.

OUR OBITUARY includes the death, in her seventy-fifth year, of Lady Susan Opdebeeck, only daughter of the tenth Duke of Hamilton, and grand-daughter of William Beckford, of "Vathek" and Fonthill celebrity, who was divorced in 1850 from the Peelite Duke of Newcastle, and ten years afterwards married M. Opdebeeck, formerly of Brussels; in her sixty-eighth year, suddenly, of the Hon. Mrs. Bruce, Bedchamber Woman in Ordinary to the Queen, daughter of the late Sir Michael Shaw Stewart, and widow of Major-General Bruce, son of the seventh Earl of Elgin, and Governor to the Prince of Wales; in his fifty-sixth year, of Sir Henry D. Torrens, Governor of Malta, who distinguished himself in the Crimean War (he was wounded at Inkerman) and in the Indian Mutiny campaigns; in his sixty-ninth year, of General John S. Paton, late Quartermaster-General of H.M.'s army in India, a distinguished Anglo-Indian veteran, who was severely wounded at Chillianwallah, and had been thirty times mentioned in despatches and orders; in his eighty-second year, of Admiral Vincent A. Massingberd; in his fifty-seventh year, of Mr. Mathew D'Arcy, head of a well-known firm of Dublin brewers, and popular M.P. for Wexford from 1868 to 1874; in his fifty-sixth year, of the Rev. Charles N. Robarts, Chaplain and Precentor of Christ Church, Oxford; very suddenly, of Dr. Francis Cuthbertson, late Fellow of Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, and Second Master of the City of London School; and in his seventy-nisth year, of Mr. Martin Farquhar Tupper, whose portrait and biography appear in this number.

THE CHINESE CENSUS is taken yearly, and costs little for official work. The oldest male inhabitants in every ten houses counts the respective families, and sends the list to the Government.

A FULL PAIL.—Mr. Levers, of the Rushes, Loughborough, writes to the Live-Stock Journal recording the weighed produce of two of his cows: One heifer in fifty-two weeks gave 9,517 lbs. of milk; and a cow, in profit ninety-four weeks (!), gave 17,780 lbs. of milk, equal to 7 tons 18 cwt. 3 qrs. of food.

FEATHERED INCENDIARIES caused the recent fire at St. William's Fever Hospital, Rochester. Birds had carried straw for their nests into the openings of the ventilators, fully half a bushel being stowed away in one of the louvres of a chimney where the straw ignited and produced the conflagration.

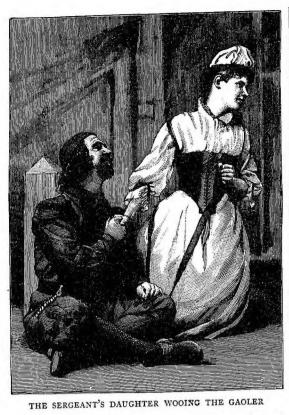

being stowed away in one of the louvres of a chimney where the straw ignited and produced the conflagration.

CHRISTMAS FAT STOCK.—The Christmas annuals are on the bookstalls of the country, and the Christmas cattle are trooping before the public. Already at Norwich last week, and at Birmingham this week, some grand animals have been exhibited. Beasts of mighty frame, harmony of proportion, velvety of touch, ripe in life to those cannibalistic eyes which anticipate the Royal sirloin smoking on the board. Using the prefix Royal reminds one that this season the Royal cattle are winning well in open competition. At Norwich, Mr. Colman's champion red-poll was, says the Farmer, "the finest fat red-polled animal that has ever appeared." In the class for steers not exceeding two years, and of any variety, H.R.H. the Prince of Wales took first-class prize, and in the sheep-classes had a first for Southdown wethers under twenty-three months, Mr. J. J. Colman being second. The Prince was also first for a pen of three short-woolled ewes.—At Birmingham Her Majesty the Queen took the coveted prize, the "Elkington Cup" for the Champion Prize of the Show, with a shorthorn, and carried off the Special Breed Prize with a Hereford; was first and second with Devon stock, second for Scotch polled heifers, and first in the class of prizes given by the Birmingham butchers. These prize animals each day of their lives have increased in weight 1 lb. 12 oz., and upwards. The Birmingham Champion increased 1.81 lb. daily, comparing with the Chicago Champion, which made 1.80 lb. increase since birth. In some cases there are records of 2 lbs. and upwards daily increase; but the daily advance of the animals above referred to is confirmatory of excellent breeding and feeding.—We may expect "Smithfield" next week will furnish a specimen which has gained its daily couple of pounds.

MR. STANLEY AND EMIN PASHA arrived at Bagamoyo on Wednesday. The Judge of the Consular Court at Zanzibar, Mr. Cracknall, had gone there to receive them officially on board H.M.S. Turquoise, which will bring the whole party to Zanzibar. The New York Herald expedition met the explorers on the 29th ult. at Msua, and found them well and hearty. Mr. Stanley is in capital health, but his appearance has greatly changed, his hair being quite white, while his moustache is iron-gray. Emin also seems no worse for his anxieties and long journey, and states that he is ready to be re-employed again in the Khedive's service. Captain Casati appears to have suffered most, having been treated brutally by the native King Kabrega, whilst acting as agent for Emin at Tunguru, on Lake Albert. Innumerable congratulatory despatches await Mr. Stanley at Bagamoyo, including a message from the King of the Belgians. Amongst the papers sent home from the Expedition is a most interesting letter from the Mahdi's General to Emin, evidently written during the summer of 1888. This despatch was intercepted by the rebel Egyptian officers when Emin and Mr. Jephson were prisoners at Dafflé, and its bearers were beaten to death by clubs. A friendly native, however, stole into the rebels' divan by night, and secretly copied the letter for Emin. After relating that "God revealed the expected Mahdi, and made him sit on His footstool, and girded him with the Sword of Victory," the General details the successes of the Khalifa, who took possession of the country, and killed all his enemies. The annihilation of Hicks Pasha's army and the death of Gordon are described. "Whoever was killed by the Mahdi's followers was at once consumed by fire," and "the spears carried by his followers had a flame burning at their points." Lord Wolseley's Soudan Expedition is construed as a triumph for the Mahdi's followers had a flame burning at their points." Lord Wolseley's Soudan Expedition is construed

IN A DEN OF LIONS, AND THEREAFTER

IN A DEN OF LIONS, AND THEREAFTER

WHEN Maurice Mangan, according to appointment, called at Lionel's rooms on the evening of Lady Adela Cunyngham's dinnerparty, he was surprised to find his friend seated in front of the fire, wrapped up in a dressing-gown.

"Linn, what's the matter with you!" he exclaimed, looking at him. "Are you ill? What have you been doing to yourself?"

"Oh, nothing," was the answer. "I have been rather worried and out of sorts lately, that is all. And I can't go to that dinner to-night, Maurice. Will you make my excuses for me, like a good fellow? Tell Lady Adela I'm awfully sorry—."

"I'm sure I shan't do anything of the sort," Mangan said, promptly. "Do you think I am going to leave you here all by yourself? You know why I accepted the invitation: mere curiosity: I wanted to see you among those people—I wanted to describe to Miss Francie how you looked when you were being alored—" curiosity: I wanted to see you among those people—I wanted to describe to Miss Francie how you looked when you were being actored—"

"My dear chap, you would have seen nothing of the sort," Lionel said. "To-night there is to be a shining galaxy of genius, and each particular star will be eager to absorb all the adoration that is going. Authors, actors, painters, musicians—that kind of people: kid-gloved Bohemia."

"Come, Linn; rouse yourself, man," his friend protested. "You'll do no good moping here by the fire. There's still time for you to dress; I came early in case you might want to walk up to Campden Hill. And you shouldn't disappoint your friends, if this is to be so great an occasion."

"I suppose you're right," Lionel said, and he rose wearily, "though I would twenty times rather go to bed. You can find a book for yourself, Maurice: I shan't keep you many minutes—" and with that he disappeare! into his dressing-room.

A four-wheeler carried them up to Campden Hill: a welcome glow of light shone forth on the carriage-drive and the dark bushes. As they entered and crossed the wide hall, they were preceded by a young lady whose name was at the same moment announced at the door of the drawing-room—"Miss Gabrielle Grey."

"Oh, really," said Mangan to his companion, as they were leaving their coats and hats. "I always thought 'Gabrielle Grey' was the pseudonym of an elderly clergyman's widow, or somebody of that kind."

"But who is Miss Gabrielle Grey?"

"You mean to say you have never even heard of her? Oh, she writes novels—very popular, toc—and very deservedly so, for that kind of thing—excellent in tone, highly moral and stuffed full of High Church sentiment; and I can tell you this, Linn, my boy, that for a lady novelist to have plenty of High Church sentiment at her command is about equivalent to holding four of a kind at poker—and that's an illustration you'll understand. Now come and introduce me to my hostess, and tell me who all the people are."

Lady Adela received both Lionel and his friend in the most kindly manner.

Lady Adela received both Electric than the control of the control to Mangan.

"Oh, I know some of them," was the answer, also in undertone.

"Rather small lions—I think she might have done better, with proper guidance. But perhaps this is only a beginning. Isn't your friend Quirk a picture! Who is the remarkably handsome girl just beyond?"

"That's Lady Adela's sister, Lady Sybil."

"The composer? I see: that's why she's talking to that portentous old ass, Schweinkopf, the musical critic. Then there's Miss Gabrielle Grey—poor thing, she's not very pretty—'I was not good enough for man, and so am given to '—publishers. By Jove, there's Ichabod—standing by the door: don't you know him?—Egerton—but they call him Ichabod at the Garrick. Now what could our hostess expect to get out of Ichabod? He has nothing left to him but bitting his nails like the senile Pope or Pagan in the Pilgrim's Progress." Progress."
"What does he do?"

"What does he do?"
"He is a reviewer, et preterea nihil. Some twenty years ago he wrote two or three novels, but people wouldn't look at them, and so he became morose about the public taste and modern literature. In fact, there has been no English literature—for twenty years: this is his wail and moan whenever an editor allows him to lift up his voice. It was feeble on the part of your friend to ask Ichabod:

she won't get anything out of him. I can see a reason for most of the others—those whom I know; but Ichabol is hopeless."

Mangan suddenly ceased these careless comments: his attention was arrested by the entrance of a tall young lady who came in very quietly—without even being announced.

"I say, who's that!" he exclaimed, under his breath.

And Lionel had been startled too; for he had convinced himself ere he came that Honnor Cunyngham was certain to be in Scotland. But there she was, as distinguished-looking, as self-possessed as ever; her glance direct and simple and calm, though she seemed to hesitate for a moment as if seeking for some one whom she might know in the crowd. From the fact of her not having been announced, Lionel guessed that she was staying in the house; perhaps, indeed, she had been in the drawing-room before. He hardly knew what to do. He forgot to answer his friend's question. If dinner were to be happily announced now, would it not save her from some embarrassment if he and she could go in their separate ways without meeting; and thereafter he could leave without returning to the drawing-room? Yet, if she was staying in the house, she must have known that he was coming?

All th's swift consideration was the work of a single second; the next second Miss Honnor's eyes had fallen upon the young man; and immediately and in the most natural way in the world she came across the room to h'm. It is true that there was a slight touch of colour visible on the gracious forchead when she offered him her hand; but there was no other sign of self-consciousness; and she said quite quietly and simply—

"It is some time since we have met, Mr. Moore; but of course I notice your name in the papers frequently."

"I hardly expected to see you here to-night," he said, in reply. "I hardly expected to see you here to-night, he said, in reply. "I hardly expected to see you here to-night, he said, in reply. "I thought you would be off to Scotland for the salmon-fishing."

"It he same moment Lord Rockminster came

And here he was seated side by side with Honnor Cunyngham, talking to her, listening to her, and with no sort of perturbation whatever. He began to ask himself whether he had ever been in love with her—whether he had not rather been in love with her way of life and its surroundings. He was thinking not so much of her as her denature on the morrow and the scenes that lay beyond. the beau monde. of the and its surroundings. He was thinking not so much of her as her departure on the morrow, and the scenes that lay beyond. Why had he not £10,000 a year—£5,000—nay,£1,000 a year—and freedom? Why could he not warm his soul with the consciousness that the salmon-rods were all packed and waiting in the hall; that new casting-lines had been put in the fly-book; that only the short drive up to Euston and a single black night lay between him and all the wide wonder of the world that would open out thereafter? Forth from the darkness into a whiter light—a larger day—a sweeter from the darkness into a whiter light—a larger day—a sweeter air; for now we are among the russet beech-hedges, the deep green pines, the purple hills touched here and there with snow; and the transfertething landscape is chining in the morning sup. and the perpines, the purple hills touched here and there with snow; and the far-stretching landscape is shining in the morning sun; and the peewits are wheeling hither and thither in the blue. Then we are thundering through rocky chasms, and watching the roaring brown torrent beneath; or panting or struggling away up the lonely altitudes of Drumouchter; and again merrily racing and chasing down into the spacious valley of the Spey. And what for the end?—the long, still strath after leaving Invershin—the penetration into the more secret solitudes—the peaks of Coulmore and Suilven in the west still strath after leaving Invershin—the penetration into the more secret solitudes—the peaks of Coulmore and Suilven in the west—and here the Aivron making a murmuring music over its golden gravel! There is a smell of peat in the air; there are children's voices about the keepers' cottages; and here is the handsome old Robert, rejoiced that the year has opened again, and Miss Honnor come back! "Well, Robert, you must come in and have a dram, and I will show you the tackle I've brought with me." "I am not wishing for a dram, Miss Honnor, so much as I am glad to see you back again, ay, and looking so well!" ""Mr. Moore," she said (and she startled him out of his reverie), "do you ever give a little dinner-party at your rooms?" "Well, seldom," he said. "You see, I have only the one evening in the week; and I have generally some engagement or other."
"I should like to send you a salmon, if it would be of any use to you," she went on to say.
"Thank you very much: I would rather see you hook and land it than have the compliment of its being sent to me twenty times getting down to the ford the day after to-morrow, and old Robert being there to welcome you. I envy him—and you. Are you to be all by yourself at the Lodge?"

"For the present, yes," Miss Honnor said. "My brother and Captain Waveney come at the beginning of April. Of course it is rather hazardous going just now; the river might be frozen over for a fortnight at a time; but that seldom happens. And in ordinarily mild weather it is very beautiful up there—the most beautiful time of the year, I think; the birch-woods are all of the clearest lilac, and the brackens turned to deep crimson; then the bent grass on the higher hills—what they call deer's-hair—is a mass of gold. And I don't in the least mind being alone in the evening—in fact, I enjoy it. It is a splendid time for reading. There is not a sound. Caroline comes in from time to time to pile on more peats and sweep the hearth; then she goes out again; and you sit not a sound. Caroline comes in from time to time to pile on more peats and sweep the hearth; then she goes out again; and you sit in an easy-chair with your back to the lamp; and if you've got an interesting book, what more company do you want? Then it's very early to bed in Strathaivron; and I've got a room that looks both ways—across the strath and down; and sometimes there is moonlight making the windows blue; or if there isn't, you can lie and look at the soft red light thrown out by the peat, until the silence is too much for you, and you are asleep before you have had time to think of it. Now tell me about yourself," she suddenly said. "I hope the constant work and the long and depressing winter have not told on you. It must have been very unpleasant getting home so late at night during the fogs."

He would rather she had continued talking about the far Aivron

He would rather she had continued talking about the far Aivron and the Geinig; he did not care to come back to the theatre and Kate Burgoyne.

"One gets used to everything, I suppose," he said.

"But still it must be gratifying to you to be in so successful a piece—to be aware of the delight you are giving evening after evening to so many people," Miss Honnor reminded him. "By the way, how is the pretty Italian girl—the young lady you said you had known in Naples?"

the way, how is the pretty Italian girl—the young lady you said you had known in Naples?"

"She has left the New Theatre," he said, not lifting his eyes.

"Oh, really. Then I'm sure that must have been unfortunate for the operetta; for she had such a beautiful voice—she sang so exquisitely—and besides that there was so much refinement and grace in everything she did. I remember mother was so particularly struck with her; we have often spoken of her since; her manner on the stage was so charming—so gentle and graceful—it had a curious fascination that was irresistible. And I confess I was delighted with the little touch of foreign accent: perhaps if she had not been so very pretty one would have been less ready to be pleased with everything. And where is she now, Mr. Moore?"

"I'm sure I don't know," Lionel said, rather unwillingly: he would rather not have been questioned.

"And is that how friendships in the theatre are kept up?" Miss Honnor said, reproachfully. "But it is all very well for us idle folk to talk. I suppose you are all far too busy to give much time to correspondence."

"No, we have not much time for letter writing," he said, absently.

Indeed it was well for him that he had this companion who absently.

Indeed it was well for him that he had this companion who could talk to him in her quiet, low tones; for he was out of spirits, and inclined to be silent; and certainly he had no wish to join in the frothy discussion which Octavius Quirk had started at the upper end of the table. Mr. Mellord, the famous Academician, had taken in Lady Adela to dinner; but she had placed Mr. Quirk on her left hand; and from this position of authority he was roaring away like any sucking doys and chellenging everywhelm to dinner. her left and; and from this position of authority he was roaring away like any sucking-dove and challenging everybody to dispute his windy platitudes. Lord Rockminster, down at the other end, mute and in safety, was looking on at this motley little assemblage, and probably wondering what his three gifted sisters would do next. It was hard that he had no Miss Georgie Lestrange to amuse him: perhaps Miss Georgie had been considered ineligible for admission into this intellectual coterie. Poor man!—and to think he might have been dining in solitary comfort at his club, at a quiet little table, with two candles, and a Sunday paper propped up by the water-bottle! But he betrayed no impatience; he sat, and looked, and meditated. looked, and meditated.

However, when dinner was over and the ladies had left the room, However, when dinner was over and the ladies had left the room, he had to go and take his sister's place, so that he found himself in the thick of the babble. Mr. Quirk was no longer goring spider's webs; he was now attacking a solid and substantial subject—nothing less than the condition of the British army; and a pretty provided by some of it. As it changed the only poor opinion he seemed to have of it. As it chanced, the only person who had seen service was Lord Rockminster (at Knightsbridge) but he did not choose to open his mouth; so that Mr. Quirk had it all his way—except when Maurice Mangan thought it worth while to give him a cuff or a kick, just by way of reminding him that he was mortal. Ichabod, in silence, stuck to the portwine. Quincey Hooper, the American journalist, drew in a chair by the side of Lord Rockminster, and humbly fawned. And meanwhile Quirk, head downward, so to speak, charged rank and file, and sent them flying; arose again and swept the heads off officers; and was just about to annihilate the volunteers when Mangan interrupted him.

"Oh, you expect too much," he said, in his slow and half-contemptuous fashion. "The British soldier is not over wellcontemptuous fashion. "The British soldier is not over well-educated, I admit; but you needn't try him by an impossible standard. I dare say you are thinking of ancient days when a Roman general could address his troops in Latin and make quite sure of being understood; but you can't expect Tommy Atkins to be so learned. And our Generals, as you say, may chiefly distinguish themselves at reviews; but the reviews they seem to me to be too fond of are those published monthly. As for the volunteers—" volunteers-

"You will have a joke about them too, I suppose," Quirk torted. "An excellent subject for a joke—the safety of the buntry! A capital subject for a merry jest: Nero fiddling with retorted.

Rome in flames—"
"I beg your pardon; Nero never did anything of the kind," Mangan observed, with a perfectly diabolical inconsequence, "for violins weren't invented in those days."

This was too much for Mr. Quirk; he would not resume argument with such a trifler; nor, indeed, was there any opportunity; for Lord Rockminster now suggested they should go into the drawing-room—and Ichabod had to leave that decanter of port.

Now, if Maurice Mangan had come to this house to see how Lionel was fêted and caressed by "the great"—in order that he might carry the tale down to Winstead, to please the old folk and Miss Francie—he was deemed to disappointment. There were very few of "the great" present, to begin with; and those who were paid no particular attention to Lionel Moore. It was Octavius Quirk who appeared to be the hero of the evening, so far as the attention appeared to be the hero of the evening, so far as the attention devoted to him by Lady Adela and her immediate little circle was concerned. But Maurice himself was not wholly left neglected. When tea was brought in, his hostess came over to where he was

When tea was brought in, his hostess came over to where he was standing.

"Won't you sit down, Mr. Mangan?—I want to talk to you about something of very great importance—importance to me, that is, for you know how vain young authors are. You have heard of my new book?—yes, I thought Mr. Moore must have told you. Well, it's all ready, except the title-page. I am not quite settled about the title yet; and you literary gentlemen are so quick and clever with suggestions—I am sure you will give me good advice. And I've had a number of different titles printed, to see how they look in type: what do you think of this one? At present it seems to be the favourite: it was Mr. Quirk's suggestion—"

She showed him a slip with North and South printed on it in large letters.

"I don't like it at all," Mangan said, frankly. "People will think the book has something to do with the American Civil War. However, don't take my opinion at all. My connection with literature is almost infinitesimal—I'm merely a newspaper hack, you know—"

"What you say about the title is quite right; and I am so much obliged to you, Mr. Mangan," Lady Adela said, with almost pathetic emphasis. "The American war, of course: I never thought of that!"

"What is Ichabod's choice?—I beg your pardon, I mean have you shown the titles to Mr. Egerton?"
"I'm afraid he doesn't approve of any of them," said Lady Adela,

"No, I suppose not; good titles went out with good fiction—when he ceased to write novels a number of years ago. May I look at the others?"

at the others?"

She handed him the slips.
"Well, now, there is one that in my poor opinion would be rather effective—Lotus and Lily—a pretty sound—"
"Yes—perhaps," said Lady Adela, doubtfully, "but then, you see, it has not much connection with the book. The worst of it is that all the novel is printed—all but the three title-pages. Otherwise that all the novel is printed—all but the three title-pages. Otherwise I might have called my heroine Lily—"

"But I fear you could not have called your hero Lotus," said Mangan, gravely. "Not very well. However, it is no use speculating on that now, as you say. What is the next one?—Transformation. Of course you know that Hawthorne wrote a book under that title, Lady Adela?"

"Yes," said she, cheerfully. "But there's no copyright in America; so why shouldn't I take the title if it suits?"

He hesitated; there seemed to be some ethical point here: but

He hesitated; there seemed to be some ethical point here; but he fell back on base expediency.

"It is a mistake for two authors to use the same title—I'm sure it is," said he. "Look at the confusion. The reviewers might pass over your novel, thinking it was only a new edition of Hawthorne's book."

"Yes, that's quite true," said Lady Adela, thoughtfully,
"Well, here is one," he continued. "Sicily and South Kensington: that's odd; that's new; that might take the popular sington: that's odd; that's new; that might take the popular fancy—"

"Do you know, that is a favourite of my own," Lady Adela said, with a slight eagerness, "for it really describes the book. You understand, Mr. Mangan, all the first part is about the South of Italy; and then I come to London and try to describe everything that is just going on round about us. I have put everything in; so that really—though I shouldn't praise myself—but it isn't praise at all, Mr. Mangan, it is merely telling you what I have aimed at—and really any one taking up my poor little book some hundred years hence might very fairly assume that it was a correct picture of all that was going on in the reign of Queen Victoria. I do not say that it is well done; not at all; that would be self-praise; but I do think it may have some little historical value. Modern life is so busy, so hurried, and so complex that it is difficult to form any impression of it as a whole; I take up book after book, written by living authors with whom I shouldn't dream of comparing myself; and yet I see how small a circle their characters work in. You would think the world consisted of only eight or ten people; and would think the world consisted of only eight or ten people; and that there was hardly room for them to move. They never get away from each other; they don't mix in the crowd; there is no crowd. But here in my poor way I am trying to show what a panorama London is—always changing—occupations, desires, struggles following one another in breathless rapidity—in short, I want to show modern life as it is, not as it is dreamed of by clever authors who live in a study. Now that is my excuse, Mr. Mangan, for being such a dreadful bore; and I am so much obliged to you for your kind advice about the title; it is so easy for clever people to be kind—just a word and it's done. Thank you," said she, as to be kind—just a word and it's done. Thank you," said she, as he took her cup from her and placed it on the table; and then, before she lest him, she ventured to say, with a charming modesty: "I'm sure you will forgive me, Mr. Mangan, but if I were to send you a copy of the book, might I hope that you would find ten minutes to glance over it?"

"I am certain I shall read it with very great interest," said he; and that was strictly true; for this Lady Adela Cunyngham completely puzzled him; she seemed so extraordinary a combination of a clever woman of the world and an awful fool.

And Lionel? Well, he had got introduced to Miss Gabrielle Grey, whom he found to be a very quiet, shy, pensive sort of creature, not posing as a distinguished person at all. He dared not talk to her of her books, for he did not even know the names of them; but he let her understand that he knew she was an authoress.

and it seemed to please her to know that her fame had penetrated into the mysterious regions behind the footlights. She began to the mysterious regions of way, about his experiences—what question him, in a timid sort of way, about his experiences—whether question him, in a time sort of way, about his experiences—whether stage-fright was difficult to get over—whether he thought that the immediate and enthusiastic approbation of the public was a beneficial stimulant—whether the continuous excitement of the emotional immediate and entimated approximate the pattern was a beneficial stimulant—whether the continuous excitement of the emotional nature tended to render it callous, or, on the other hand, more sensitive and sympathetic—and so forth: was she dinally looking forward to the conquest of a new domain, where the young ladies of the rectory and the vicarage might be induced fearfully to follow her? But Lionel did not linger long in that drawing-room. He got Maurice Mangan away as soon as he could; they slipped out unobserved—especially as there were plenty of newcomers now arriving; when they had passed down through the back garden to the gate, the one lit a cigarette, and the other a pipe; and together they wended their way towards Kensington Road and Piccadilly. "Why," said Mangan, "I shall have quite a favourable report to carry down to Winstead. I did not see you treated with any of that unwholesome adulation I have heard so much of!"

"I am almost a stranger in the house, now," Lionel said, briefly. "Why?"

"Oh, various circumstances, of late."

"They did not even ask you to sing," his friend said, in accents of some surprise.

"They dared not. Didn't you see that most of the people were strangers? How could Lady Adela be sure she was not wounding strangers? How could Lady Adeia be sure sne was not wounding somebody's susceptibilities by having operatic music on a Sunday evening? She knew nothing at all about half these people—they were merely names to her, that she had collected round her in order that she might count herself in among the arts."

"That ill-conditioned brute Quirk seemed to me to be dominating that the bear "said Mangan, rather testily." It's an awful price the whole thing," said Mangan, rather testily. "It's an awful price to pay for a few puffs. I wonder a woman like that can bear him to come near her; but she pets the baboon as if he were a King Charles spaniel. Linnie, my boy, you're no longer first favourite. I can see that; self-interest has proved too strong; the flattering little review, the complimentary little notice, has ousted you. It isn't you who are privileged to meet my Lady Morgan in the street-

"Not the salmon-fishing young lady I have heard you speak of?"
"Yes."

"Why, she didn't look like that," said Mangan, thoughtfully. "Not the least. She has got a splendid forehead—powerful and clear; and almost too much character about the square brows and the calm eyes. I should have taken her to be a strongly intellectual woman—of the finer and more reticent type. Well, well—a salmon-fisher!"

"Why shouldn't she be both?"
"Why, indeed?" said Maurice, absently; and therewith he relapsed (as was frequently his wont) into silence; and in silence the two friends pursued their way eastwards to Lionel's rooms.

But when they had arrived at their destination, when soda-water

But when they had arrived at their destination, when soda-water had been produced and opened, and when Mangan was lying back in an easy-chair, regarding his friend, he resumed the conversation.

"I should have thought going to see those people to-night woull have brightened you up a little," he began, "but you seem thoroughly out-of-sorts, Linn. What is the matter? Over-work or worry? I should not think over-work; I've never seen your theatre-business prove too much for you. Worry? What about, then?"

"There may be different things," Lionel said, evasively, as he brought over the spirit case. "I haven't been sleeping well of late—lying awake even if I don't go to bed till three or four; and I get a singing in my ears sometimes that is bothersome. Oh, never mind me; I'm all right."

"But I'm going to mind you; for you are not all right. Is it money?"

"But I'm going to mind you; for you are not all right. Is it money?"

"No, no."

"What, then? There is something seriously worrying you."

"Oh, there are several things," Lionel exclaimed, forced at last into confession. "I can't think what has become of Nina Ross, that's one thing; if I only knew she was safe and well, I don't think I should mind the other things. No, not a bit. But there was something about her going away that I can't explain to you—only I—I was responsible in a sort of way; and Nina and I were always such good friends and companions—well, it's no use talking about that. Then there's another little detail," he added, with an air of indifference: "I'm engaged to be married."

Mangan stared at him.

Mangan stared at him.

"Engaged to be married?" he repeated, as if he had not heard aright.

"To whom?"

"Miss Burgoyne."

"Miss Burgoyne—of the New Theatre?"

"The same.

"Are you out of your senses, Linn!" Maurice crie!, angrily.
"No, I don't think so," he said, and he went to the mantelpiece for a cigarette.

"How did it come about?" demanded Maurice again. "Oh, I don't know. It isn't of much consequence, is it?"
Lionel answered carelessly.

Then Maurice instantly reflected that, if this thing were really done, it was not for him to protest.

uone, it was not for him to protest.

"Of course I say nothing against the young lady—cert his not. I thought she was very pleasant the night I was introduced to her, and nice-looking too. But I had no idea you were taken in that quarter, Linn: none—hence the surprise. I used to think you were in the happy position which Landor declared impossible. What were the lines—I haven't seen them for twenty years—but they were something like this—

Fair maiden, when I look on thee, I wish that I were young and free; But both at once, ah, who could be!

I thought you were 'both at once'—and very well contert. But supposing you were 'both at once'—and very well contert. During supposing you have given up your freedom, why should that vex and trouble you? The engagement-time is said to be the happiest period of a man's life: what is wrong in your case?"

Lionel took a turn or two up and down the room.

"Well, I will tell you the truth Maurice" be blurted out at last.

"Well, I will tell you the truth, Maurice," he blurted out at last. "Well, I will tell you the truth, Maurice," he blurted out at last. "I got engaged to her in a fit of restlessness, or caprice, or some such ridiculous nonsense; and I don't regret it; I mean, I am willing to stand by it; but that is not enough for her—and I can look forward to nothing but a perpetual series of differences and quarrels. She expects me to play Harry Thornhill off the stage, I suppose. Mangan looked at him for some time.

"Even between friends," he said, slowly: "there are some thing it is difficult to talk about with safety. Of course you know what an outsider would say: that you had got into a devil of a messitate you had blundered into an engagement with a woman whom you find you don't want to marry."

you find you don't want to marry.

"Well, is there anything uncommon in that?" Lionci demanded. Is that an unusual experience in human life? But I don't admit as much, in my case. I am quite willing to marry her, so long as she keeps her temper, and doesn't expect me to play the fool. I have say we shall get on well enough, like other people, after the dateful deed is done. In the mean time, "he added, with a forced laugh, "in the mean time, I find myself now and again wishing I look a sailor brave and bold, careering round the Cape of Good laugh, "in the mean time, I find myself now and again wishing I look in a gale of wind, and with no loftier aspiration in my mind thou in a pint of rum and a well-filled pipe!"

"Faith, I think that's just where you ought to be," said Mangan, drily, "instead of in this town of London, at the present moment. I declare you've quite bewildered me. If you had told me you were engaged to that tall salmon-fishing girl—you used to talk ghout her a good deal, you know—or to that fascinating young Italian creature—and I've seen before now how easily the gentle friend and companion can be transformed into a sweetheart—I shoul have been ready with all kinds of pretty speeches and good wishes. But Miss Burgoyne of the New Theatre? Linn, my boy, Tre discovered what's the matter with you; and I can prescribe an absolutely certain cure."

"What I don't admit admit admit a don't a demanded the property and a supplied to the present a descovered what's the matter with you; and I can prescribe an absolutely certain cure."

"What is it?"

"The cure? You have partly suggested it yourself. You must go at once and take your passage in a sailing-ship for Australia. You can stay there for a time and examine the Colony; of course you? write a book about it, like everybody else. Then you make your write a book about it, like everybody else. Then you make your write a book about it, like everybody else. Then you make your write there. You come on to New York; and accept a three months' engagement there. And when you return to England, you will find that all your troubles have vanished, and that you are once again the Linn Moore we all of us used to know."

A wild fancy flashed through Lionel's brain: what if in these far wanderings he were suddenly to encounter Nina? In vain—in vain: Nina had become for him but a shadow, a ghost, with no voice to call to him from any sphere.

"You would have me run away?—I don't see how I can do that," he said quietly; and then he abruptly changed the subject. "What did you think of Lady Adela?"

"Well, to tell you the truth, I've been wondering whether she was at the same time a smart and clever woman and an abject fool, or whether she was simply smart and clever and thought me an abject fool. It must be either one or the other. She played the literary ingénue very well—a little too openly perhaps. I'm curious ahout her book—"

"Oh, don't judge of her by her book!" Lionel exclaimed. "That isn't fair. Her book you may very likely consider foolish; lut she isn't foolish—not at all. I suppose her head is a little bit literary inginue very well—a little too openly perhaps. I'm curious about her book—"

"Oh, don't judge of her by her book!" Lionel exclaimed.
"That isn't fair. Her book you may very likely consider foolish; but she isn't foolish—not at all. I suppose her head is a little bit urned by the things that Quirk and those fellows have been writing about her; but that's only natural. And if she showed her hand a little too freely in trying to interest you in her novel, you must remember how eager she is to succeed. You'll do what you can for her book—won't you, Maurice?"

Maurice Mangan, on his way home that night, had other things to think of than Lady Adela's poor little book. He saw clearly enough the embroilment into which Lionel had landed himself; but he could not see so clearly how he was to get out of it. One question he forgot to ask: what had induced that mood of petulance or recklessness or both combined in which Lionel had wilfully and madly pledged all his future life? However, the thing was done; here was his friend going forward to a mariage de convenance (where there was very little convenance, to be sure) with a sort of careless indifference, if not of bravado; while his bride, on the other hand, might surely be pardoned if she resented, and indignantly resented, his attitude towards her. What kind of prospect was this for two young people? Maurice thought that on the very first opportunity he would go away down to Winstead and talk the matter over with Francie; who than she more capable of advising in aught concerning Lionel's welfare?

Notwithstanding his intercession with Maurice on behalf of Lady who than she more capable of advising in aught concerning Lionel's welfare?

Notwithstanding his intercession with Maurice on behalf of Lady Adela's forthcoming novel, Lionel did not seem disposed to resume the friendly relations with the people up at Campden Hill which had formerly existed. He did not even call after the dinner-party. If Mr. Octavius Quirk were for the moment installed as chief favourite at Aivron Lodge, he had no wish to interfere with him: there were plenty of other houses open, if one chose to go. But the fact is, Lionel now spent many afternoons and nearly every evening at the Garden Club: whist before dinner, poker after supper, being the established rule. Moreover, a new element had been introduced, as far as he was concerned. Mr. Percival Miles had been elected a member of the club; and had forthwith presented himself in the cardersom, where he at once distinguished himself by his bold and intrepia play. The curious thing was that, while openly professing a kinet of cold acquaintanceship, it was invariably against Lionel Moere that he made his most determined stand; with the other players he might play an ordinarily discreet and cautious game; but when Moore could be challenged, this pale-faced young man never failed promptly to seize the opportunity. And the worst of it was that he had extraordinary luck, both in the run of the cards and in his n monveres.

when Moore could be challenged, this pale-faced young man never failed promptly to seize the opportunity. And the worst of it was that he had extraordinary luck, both in the run of the cards and in his nuneuvres.

"What is that young whipper-snapper up to?" Lionel said to himself, after a particularly bad night (and morning) as he sat staring into the dead ashes of his fireplace. "He wanted to take my lie until my good angel interfered and saved me. Now does he want to break me financially? By Jove, they're coming near to doing it amongst them. I shall have to go to Moss to-morrow for another £250. Well, what does it matter? The luck must turn some time. If it doesn't?—then there may come the trip before the mast, as the final panacea, according to Maurice. Augustia?—there would be freedom there, and perhaps forgetfulness."

As he was passing into his bedroom he chanced to observe a passage that was lying on a chair, and for a second he glanced at the handwriting of the address. It was Miss Burgoyne's. What could she want with him now? He cut the string, and opened the land knitted for him with her own fair hands. Why those imparts thy down-drawn brows? A true lover would have passionately disable this tender token of affection, and bethought him of all the hears, and half-hours, and quarters-of-an-hour, during which she half-wen employed in her pretty task, no doubt thinking of him all he time. Alas! the love-gift was almost angrily thrown on to the char again—and he went into his own room.

This Summer has been Exceptionally Hot in China. Shanghai and Ningpo were perfect ovens in July, and many Europeals died from sunstroke and heat-apoplexy. On July 7th, the temometer marked 101 deg. in the shade at Shanghai—the highest record for many years. Rain was much wanted, and the Emperor with his princes and head nobles visited the chief temples round Pekin to pray for wet weather, but without result. At last, a very sected dragon tablet was brought into Pekin with great ceremony, and, to the delight of the Chinese, a heavy storm of rain occurred for a fiterwards, which was universally attributed to the virtue of the tablet.

"The Roof of France" (Bentley) is much more than a good tourists' book. Of course Miss Betham Edwards knows France well; is it not due to her that the newest edition of Murray is so vastly superior to the older ones? All she says about scenery, and cheap but not nasty hotels, and undiscovered bains (long may they remain so) like Vic-sur-Cère, is sure to be both authentic and valuable. But far more important than all this—which people will find out for themselves, when even Château-Chinon in the Morvan, close to Vercingetorix's Bibracte (Mount Beauvray), gets its railroad—are her notes on peasant ownership and petite culture. Lady Verney has painted in the darkest colours the sordid misery in which, over large tracts, these little landowners exist. Miss Edwards never came across the misery, rarely across anything like sordes. In her experience, peasant proprietorship is an uniform success. The life is hard; but how infinitely preferable to that of Hodge, liable to eviction at a week's notice if the farmer he works for, having got out of bed in a bad temper, thinks he isn't so civil as he ought to be! Everywhere she finds "independence, thrift, and foresight, called forth by the all-potent agency of possession" (p. 77). Even where the phylloxera has done its wicked worst, and aniline dyes have made madder a drug in the market, "the peasant-owner never loses heart. He drives his plough across the ruined vineyards, digs up the madder-fields, plants other crops, and cheerfully accepts a fourth part of the profits." There is plenty besides in this delightful took—a good account of Orange, for instance, whose grand Roman arch just escaped destruction, not at the hands of the Reds, but of Maurice of Nassau; but what we want to know is: how about petite culture? I reland will be parcelled out among peasant-owners if landlords don't stand out for absurdly-stiff prices. Will they succeed in a far worse climate than that of the Morvan or of the "Causses" of the Lozère? They can't keep silkworms; and if they make goat's-mil practical.

"The Bookworm" (Elliot Stock), along with frontispiece from an early block-book, portrait of Albert Dürer, facsimile titles of Coverdale's and Cranmer's Bibles, and (strange contrast) a picture of a Greek Chorus, gives a medley in which book-fanciers are sure to find much to interest them. "Baron Munchausen," the authorship of which foiled even Southey; Drayton's "Polyolbion," which fell flat (no wonder; it runs to 30,000 lines), "such a cloud," said the author, "hath the devil drawn over men's judgment;" the "Flagellum Salutis," which prescribes a good flogging as the best cure not only for ague, but even for short sight; notices of Newbery, Christie, Rowlandson, &c.; such is a sample of this tasteful farrago. The note on "Spurious Title-pages" may possibly save bookbuyers' pockets.

The note on "Spurious Title-pages" may possibly save bookbuyers' pockets.

The new volume of Mr. Gomme's "Gentleman's Magazine Library" (Elliot Stock), consisting of Bibliographical Notes, has, to some extent, the same scope as "The Bookworm." Its most generally interesting passages, however, are those on early Almancks and Newspapers, about which Mr. A. C. Bickley has been able to cull some new matter from the forgaten pages of "Sylvanus Urban." Many of his "notes," too, are on topics not given in the index. The volume contains a mass of out-of-the-way lore, such as the "Ludus septem sapientum," probably by Dunlop, author of the "History of Fiction."

In Dr. A. Japp's "Good Men and True" (Fisher Unwin) one goes at once to Edward Denison and Arnold Toynbee, who, the former in 1867, the latter in 1875, went to live in poor lodgings in Commercial Road. They are well written, as indeed are the rest, including Conington (one scarely sees why he is here). Mr. Plimsoll, Sir T. Salt, Canon Kingsley, Dean Stanley, Norman Macleod, Dr. Guthrie, and Bishop Hannington. We strongly protest against the constant reproduction of the last too sad pages of the Bishop's journal. It can serve no purpose except to remind us that all this anguish and humiliation (along with much disaster besides) is due to the "vigorous action" of the German Equatorial Expedition, and the free hand it gave to "Corporal Schlag,"

Is it a good sign that in the Camelot Series "Walden" is so soon followed by "A Week on the Concord" (Walter Scott)? Anything is wholesome which warns us not "to lose for living's sake the why of life;" but Thoreau wearies, with his eternal amplification of the half-true truism "My mind to me a kingdom is," because he has such a peculiarly priggish way of telling us wood Reade might maunder about "the rich bovine smell" of a Mahomedan village, whereas pagan negroes keep only cocks and hens; but milk and beef are too dearly bought, if the result is a Continent-full of slave-catchers. If Cardinal Lavigerie succeeds in giving a grand impulse to the work in which Sir S. Baker was foiled, if he can give it something of the character of a Crusade, he will be a more effectual Las Casas. In any case we all wish to know as much as possible about the man who has thrown himself into this great work with as much energy as Cardinal Manning displayed about the Dock Strike. Mr. R. F. Clarke tells us all; Mgr. Lavigerie's work as Bishop of Nancy being as fully detailed as his career since he became Archbishop of Algeria.

clarke tells us all; Mgr. Lavigerie's work as Bishop of Nancy being as fully detailed as his career since he became Archbishop of Algeria.

Mr. C. E. Jennings has so identified his name with "Cancer" (Baillière) that his treatise will be sure to take rank as a text-book. It is a book for doctors; and, yet the subject, bearing as it does on the "Contagious Diseases" controversy, is of great interest to laymen. The malignity of the disease may be judged from the result of Butlin's operations (p. 119); all. but one proved fatal from the recurrence of the disease, though all had recovered and were temporarily relieved. One form of cancer, that which afflicts chimney-sweeps, has almost disappeared. This seems to show that the best way of getting rid of cancer is to remove the conditions which predispose to cancerous deposit. Mr. Jennings is widely known for his experiments on transfusion of blood and saline fluids, carried out five years ago at Ghent.

Mr. Baring Gould is indefatigable. He sometimes has two novels running together, and yet finds leisure for "Curious Mediæval Myths," "Talmudic Legends," and "Sermon Notes." His "Historic Oddities" (Methuen) have already appeared in various magazines; and there, we think, they might have remained. Nothing is pleasanter than to read in an old magazine volume a story like "Sophie Apitzsch," the armourer's daughter, who, running away in man's dress to avoid a hateful marriage, was thought to be the Crown Prince of Saxony, and was treated accordingly. But if all such stories are to be gathered into new volumes, even Mr. Mudie will have to build new barns. "Prince Hohenlohe" was a "faith-healer." "The Disappearance of Bathurst" undoubtedly made life at St. Helena harder for Bonaparte, whom the family (though Mr. Baring Gould says wrongfully) assumed to be his murderer. "A wax and honeymoon" is poor fooling.

The fifth volume of "The Carisbrooke Library" continuing the work of the Universal Library, contains "Milton's English Prose Writings" (Routledge), with a valuable intr type," in order to pack in "The Ready and Easy Way to a Free Commonwealth."

Mrs. Julian Marshall has added to the already too-abundant Shelley literature two large volumes of "The Life and Letters of Mary Wolstonecraft Shelley" (Bentley). Those who care for the subject will study her work, for it is painstaking enough to be exhaustive. We cannot help asking, Cui bono? What good can come of the old extracts about that runaway French tour at the end of which the strange pair came back to borrow money from poor Harriet Westbrook? If the book is intended to show the utter heartlessness of tongue-philanthropists and their cynical disregard of others where their own comfort is concerned, well and good. Godwin appears as a compound of Pecksniff and Micawber, cowed by his vulgar wife, and always afraid to apply to his own case the new laws by which he talked of regenerating society. Shelley is the most pitiable object in all literature, writing divine verses, yet pulled this way and that by "Clare," "the sprightly, restless Miss Clairmont," and "the judicious Mrs. Mason," and the whole tribe. Mrs. Marshall writes "by the request of Sir Percy and Lady Shelley." It is hard to believe that they acquiesce in her cruel way of treating the memory of Shelley's first wife. If the worst that has ever been alleged against her is true; if, after Shelley ran off with Godwin's daughter, "she lived a fast life," who had persistently preached her the Gospel of Free Love? She would only have been carrying out to her own ruin the theories which the visionary sophist "whose sensations at her death were those of horror, not of remorse" (!) had always been inculcating. The Shelley family can surely have no wish to blacken her whose death will always lie at the poet's door. at the poet's door.

RECENT POETRY AND VERSE

THERE is the freshness and brightness of the atmosphere of a spring morning in the volume of verse from the pen of Miss Harriet Eleanor Hamilton King, entitled "Ballads of the North and Other Poems" (Kegan Paul). The tragedy which may work itself out in the human heart is exemplified in "The Haunted Czar"; pity, tenderness, and gratitude are finely pictured in the "Irish Famine"; while, in "All Souls' Day," the note of the weird and mystic is struck. A stranger, on a November night of storm and rain, suddenly stands on the deck of a ship sailing to the Islands of the Blest, to the Haven of the Saints. One only of the voyagers follows the stranger, and the poem ends too abruptly as they near the land. In "The Ballad of the Midnight Sun," the first timid outburst of nature-life at the dawn of the Arctic summer is pictured with much descriptive force. Miss King should gain in reputation by her latest work.

Following in the footsteps of the lamented Bowdler, Mr. II. Macaulay Fitz-Gibbon, M.A., gives us "Famous Elizabethan Plays" (W. H. Allen); expurgated and adapted for modern use. The volume includes "The Shoemaker's Holiday," by Thomas Dekker; "The Knight of the Burning Pestle," by Beaumont and Fletcher; "Epicæne; or, the Silent Woman," by Ben Jonson; "A New Way to Pay Old Debts," by Philip Massinger; "Perkin Warbeck," by John Ford; and "The Two Noble Kinsmen." The texts are as pure and correct as possible, Mr. Fitz-Gibbon says; the fact of an omission is always denoted by an asterisk, that of a trivial alteration by an obelisk. The plays are printed in large clear type, and we will hope with its conscientious editor that the book "may be found of service for educational purposes, opening up and rendering available one of the most valuable portions of English poetic and dramatic literature." He has certainly provided us in a single, readable, volume with half a dozen masterpieces by various old English dramatists.

If half that has been said of a certain poem is true, there are many folk who will be grateful to and that they are not true. However, Miss Morison has made the dark places plain, and now he that runs may read with the understanding what is by common consent the most difficult of Mr. Browning's poems. This useful little work was originally written for the members of the Edinburgh Women Students' Browning Club.

THE GRAPHIC

Messrs. Ascherberg and Co.—A song which is replete with healthy sentiment is "John's Wife," words by Frederick E. Weatherly, music by J. L. Roeckel; it is published in three keys.—One of the prettiest ballads of the season is "Only Bubbles," words by Arthur Chapman, music by A. H. Behrend; the compass is from C below the lines to the octave above.—"Love's Reverie," written and composed by Edward Oxenford and H.-Kreuz, is a fairly good song of the tender passion; published in three keys.—Of the same type as the above is "Españita," a Spanish love-song, words by F. Bowyer, music by Antonio L. Mora; this song requires careful study; it will be well to learn it by heart.—An album of "Six Songs," music by Frances Allitsen, is worthy the attention of amateurs with voices of limited compass, as the songs are all within the middle octave; with the exception of "Thy Presence" (No. 4), words by Fanny Kemble, which is for a contralto voice.—A favourite song by Sidney Smith, "For You," has been ably transcribed for the violin and pianoforte by Guido Popini. May Ostlere has arranged "For You" as a waltz, with her usual taste and skill. One of the best specimens of its school is "Love Can Wait," words by G. Clifton Bingham, music by H. Trotère. A long and successful career may be anticipated for this charming song.

INTERNATIONAL MUSIC PUBLISHING COMPANY.—When it is stated that 105,000 copies of a work have been sold, we are quite prepared to meet with something worthy of special notice, and are not disappointed in "Urbach's Prize Pianoforte Tutor," which has reached its sixteenth edition. Originally published in German, a very excellent translation into English is given by Eliza M. Wiley. To prove its value, we need only mention that Karl Reinecke, of Leipsic, Isidor Seiss, of Cologne, and Professor Theodor Kullak, of Berlin, highly approve of this clever work. The preface and introductory remarks are of the greatest utility to teachers and to pupils. We cordially endorse a remark made by the author:—"As to the time allotte we can with but little difficulty carry it whither we desire.

Messrs. Duff and Stewart.—A song which will please at a seaside musical reading is "The Good Pilot," written and composed by Lionel Langleigh and J. Austin Cameron."—The second number of "Selections from Elijah" (Mendelssohn) is as good as its predecessor. Adrian de Lorme has skilfully arranged and adapted for the pianoforte "The Baal Chorus," "The Harvest now is Over" (chorus), the ever popular trio for female voices, "Lift Thine Eyes," the two beautiful solos, "Hear Ye, Israel (soprano), and "O Rest in the Lord" (contralto). This well-chosen selection finishes with the grand chorus, "Be not Afraid."—A sprightly afterdinner piece for the pianoforte is "Frolic of the Fairies," a tarantelle, by W. F. Sudds.

MISCELLANEOUS.—A pretty song of the domesticated school is "Children;" words by Harriet Austin, music by L. Barone. "Only an Answer" is a simple ballad, written and composed by Arthur T. M'Evoy (Messrs. Beal and Co.).—A good tenor may do well with "Flow'rets Fair;" words by J. Hubi Newcombe, music by George C. Richardson. This song is published in but one key. In the home circle, "Evening Thoughts," written and composed by J. Wilmot, E. Page, and Arthur Briscoe, will find favour (Messrs. C. B. Tree and Co.).—Of a very conventional type is "When Thou Art Near," the sentimental words by M. Hedderwick Browne, the music by William Jones. A very feeble valse is "Kindred Hearts" (with vocal refrain ad lib.), by Harriett V. Steer, who is evidently an amateur, and from whom better things may be looked for in time to come (Messrs. Reid Brothers).—A dainty little lullaby is "Hush!" music by Edward F. Spence (William Reeves).—The words of "Kathleen Astore," written by William N. Oliver, are worthy of a less commonplace musical setting than that supplied by E. Breakspeare Smith (Messrs. James Smith and Son).—"Dreams, Only Dreams," is a fairly good love-song, written and composed by Edward Oxenford and Alfred T. Blanchett (W. T. Blanchett).—"So Long Ago," a love-song, written and composed by Fergus Hume and Charles Willeby, is of a very ordinary type, but will no doubt please the friends of poet and composer (Messrs. Enoch and Sons).

In his novel with the suggestive title of "The Curse of Carne's Hold" (2 vols.: Spencer Blackett and Hallam), Mr. G. A. Henty gives his elder readers the pleasure of reverting to a style of fiction which novelists generally—not always to the advantage of themselves or of their public—have long left behind them. It is a frank story of mysterious crime, without any psychological or other affectation; and though hereditary homicidal mania is certainly rather a ghastly subject, Mr. Henty's strictly conventional treatment of it serves as a completely efficient nerve-protector. It is difficult to be impressed one way or another by our old friend the lunatic, who, having concealed his true character for as long as it was necessary to keep up a show of mystery, breaks out in the usual way by burning down his house, defying his would-be rescuers from the roof, and living just long enough to gloat over a murder which might have brought either of two innocent men to the gallows. All this is decidedly stagey; nor very much more rational is the conduct of his sane cousin, Ronald Mervyn, who, rightfully acquitted of the murder to the complete satisfaction of his brother officers and everybody who knew him, instead of showing the world a brave face hides himself under a false name as a private in the Cape Mounted Rifles, and even refuses to marry the girl whom he loves and who loves him, although she and her father know his whole story, and believe absolutely in his innocence. His eccentricity, however, enables his author to carry him through romantic and desperate adventures during the Kaffir War; and we need not say how gallantly and chivalrously he, guided by Mr. Henty's experienced hand, dashes through them. The novel has plenty of life and spirit; the secret of the plot is kept just to the right point, that is to say, so as to enable the ordinary reader to give himself credit for more penetration than the characters; and whoever thinks there is not enough incident must be greedy indeed.

Mr. George Manville Fenn's novels are by this time numercus enough to make comparison among them difficult; while they are of such exceedingly various degrees of quality that one never knows whether one is invited to such admirable literary fare as his "Master of the Ceremonies" or—let us simply say, Not. "Of High Descent" (3 vols.: Ward and Downey) occupies a middle place between Mr. Fenn's two extremes. In description it is excellent; in eccentric portraiture it shows skill and humour; in the matter of plot and construction it savours too much of the art of book-making—an impression still further borne out by sundry little devices well known to experienced writers who have ever been so hurried to write that they had to trust to luck for what they were going to say. Among these are long deserts of bald and common-place talk, which may be intended to represent nature; but seem, on the surface, meant to occupy space and time. But Mr. Fenn, even when he gives himself the least chance of success, is not the man to fail wholly. As a set-off against the utterly incomprehensible conduct of his heroine in running away from home, risking her reputation, and cruelly hiding away from her father and her lover because her exceedingly contemptible brother was afraid of the police, is that brother's powerfully sensational concealment in a Cornish cave, and his escape from arrest in a manner which is certainly not the less effective for being unquestionably unprecedented and very questionably possible.

It is to be hoped that Dora Russell has not (save in the matter of Cornish cave, and his escape from arrest in a manner which is certainly not the less effective for being unquestionably unprecedented and very questionably possible.

It is to be hoped that Dora Russell has not (save in the matter of tea-gowns and other articles of costume) drawn from original observation in the construction of "Jezebel's Friends" (3 vols.: Spencer Blackett and Hallam). Nor is it likely; for it reads like some distorted picture of passion, wickedness, and folly, as imagined by a mind too gentle even to know what such things mean. One does not believe in Major Audley, who compels a woman who hates and despises him to marry him, under the threat that he will otherwise ruin the character of her sister. As little do we believe in Ruth Forth, who, supposed to be an angel, and with her love given to another man, marries him under such conditions, knowing that she is breaking her true lover's heart, and solely in order that her sister may cheat an honest and singularly trustful old gentleman into marrying her, and so giving her a position in society and the safety of his name. A real Ruth would have defied the Major, knowing that he dared not sentence himself to the position of a social pariah by fulfilling his menace. Nor, it is to be hoped, would the real Major, when he did betray the secret he had bound himself to keep, have (despite the privileges oddly supposed to be conferred by an artificial leg) escaped a condign thrashing at the hands of the impulsive young man to whom it was betrayed, and who was in a peculiar sense bound to be the incriminated lady's protector and champion. But it is impossible to go through the list of what "Jezebel's Friends" would or would not have done, had they been real. The novel is up to its authoress's mark in other respects; but the Divorce Court and its precincts are happily not in her line.

"For One and the World," by M. Betham-Edwards (2 vols.: Ward and Downey), is more odd than successful. The opening piques the reader's interest at once by making him wonder more so. As soon as the curiosity is satisfied, the interest passes—the incidents are without necessary connection, and the general effect is that of wasted ingenuity. Nevertheless, the novel is odd, and it is ingenious; and that is not a little to say.

It is fortunately not often that we have to do with such nauseating stuff as "The Triumph of Manhood," by Marie Connor (3 vols.: Chapman and Hall). To say the least, the Platonic, and not always Platonic, amours of priests and schoolgirls are neither wholesome to write of nor to read of, even when the flavour of them is modified by circumstantial impossibilities; and if any French ichools be conducted in the manner described, Marie Connor has a much more definite duty before her than making them material for ichools be conducted in the manner described, Marie Connor has a much more definite duty before her than making them material for fiction. As it is, she only succeeds in exciting incredulity; and there is something worse than waste of the power she certainly possesses in assuming that her readers' sympathies will be with a heroine whose notion of filial duty is to allow her father (a priest who has deserted her mother) to betray an innocent to conviction for a murder which her father himself has committed. One is tempted to wonder whether the authoress has the faintest comprehension of her own drift and meaning; and to give her the benefit of the doubt we are more than willing. are more than willing

CHRISTMAS NUMBERS

II.

THE Figaro Illustre, an English edition of which is sent us by Messrs. Boussod, Valadon, and Co., is an almost unique production in the matter of coloured pictures, which are reproduced by the "chromotypogravure" process. M. Adrian Moreau's "Flirtation" forms the most attractive subject, but Carolus Duran's "Roses," and Dulort's illustrations to "Gyp's" story, "Scarlet Fever," are also good in their separate ways. M. Alexandre Dumas's story, "Heads or Tails," occupies the place of honour; M. Jules Simon contributes a short story, "The Wedding Journey," illustrated by Bayard; and M. Caran D'Ache a page of humorous sketches entitled "The Lion Hunt."—The greater portion of The World Christmas Number is devoted to "Quinnion's Quest, and What Came of It," a society story of the sensational order of fiction.

"A. B.'s" pencil enlivens the Number with sketches, in his familiar style, of groups of notabilities at different fashionable resorts, such as "Eton v. Harrow at Lord's," "On the Club Lawn, Cowes," &c., whilst a further attraction is to be found in "Elmeira," a Brighton story up to date.—The Christmas Numbers of the Girk' Oun Paper ("Christmas Cherries") and Boys' Own Paper consist of an olla podrida of sketches, poems, charades, and short stories, &c., suitable to the tastes of their readers. The chief literary contributors are Ascott R. Hope, Henry Frith, Talbot Baines Reed, G. Weatherley, and Lady Violet Greville. Louis Wain, Alfred Parsons, A. F. Lydon, and T. C. Heath are mainly responsible for the illustrations.—Our little ones will be able to find both instruction and amusement in "The Bairns' Annual" (Field and Tuer), edited by Miss Alice Corkran. The Annual consists of old-fashioned fairy tales and simple ballads, profusely illustrated with quaint engravings, and it will be sure to find favour with the petits enfants.—"Wellington's First Encounter with the French," from the painting by F. W. Joy, forms the subject of the coloured plate presented with "Yule Tide" (Cassell). Mr. William Black contributes and Co.) consists of a "shilling shocker" of the most sensational type, entitled "A Wave of Brain Power," by Sir Gilbert Camptell Bart., and an original musical drawing-room play by R. Andre. Winter's "Annual," entitled "Buttons," is, of course, a story from the pen of John Strange Winter. Buttons is an officer in the 21st Dragoons, who, in order to marry the girl he boves, sells ont, and ultimately enlists as a private. This story of army life is pleasantlytold in John Strange Winter's well-known and popular style. The frontispiece of the Christmas Double Number of the English Illustrated Magazine is a fine engraving by M. O. Latour, from the picture of "All Hands to the Pump," by Mr. H. S. Tuke. Mr. Grant Allen finds suitable work for his graphic pen in describing the wild beauties of Dartmoor, being ably seconded by the pencil of Mr. W. B. Gardner, who presents us with many a picturesque bit of scenery by way of illustration. Mr. Hugh Thomson humorously illustrates the old ditty "Oh! Dear, What Can the Matter Be?" Mr. Outram Tristram gives an interesting account of "A Storied Tavern," which is illustrated by Mr. Herlert Raiton, and Mr. Clark Russell contributes one of his tales of the set. More solit matter is to be found in "Poachers Furred and Feathered," by Mr. G. E. Lodge; "Nails and Chains," by Rev. Har All Rylett; and "In the Peloponnesus," by James Baker, illustrated by Walter Crane.—The Double Number of "Atalanta" contains several complete stories by such authors as Mr. W. E. Norms, Miss C. M. Yonge, Mrs. L. B. Walford, and others, besides the continuation of the usual serials. The frontispiece is a tinted picture entitled "Olaf, the Sea-King."—The Christmas Number of "East and West" includes a number of well-known authors amongst its contributors. The Rev. S. Baring Gould gives an amusing little sketch under the somewhat lachrymose title of "De Duobus Mortuis," Mrs. Macquoid contributes a further instalment of her charming story "Cosette," other contributors to the number being Helen Mathers, Mrs. M

THE SEASON turned from mild to frosty weather on Tuesday, November 26th. It is comparatively seldom that an exact date can be fixed for the beginning of winter, but in the present instance the change of temperature was general throughout Great Britain. On the afternoon of the 26th snow fell rather heavily both in Leeds and Birmingham, while on the 27th the Cumberland and Snowdon ranges were covered, and in London the fall of snow was thick enough to form a complete white pall on the roofs of outhouses, though the pavement and roadway, being apparently much warmer than the air, melted the snow as soon as it reached the ground. The 28th, 29th, and 30th were all cold and frosty days, and the temperature was ten degrees below the mean. Thus, with the 26th there were forty degrees of accumulated deficiency to subtract from twenty-five previous days' accumulated surplus of seventy-five degrees of warmth. This still leaves November, 1889, as thirty-five degrees of warmth. This still leaves November, or a mean of I I-6 degrees of daily heat above the average, and represented an accumulation of ninety degrees of heat. As at the entof November 1888, so on November 26th last the autumn-sown wheat was in an unusually forward and vigorous state. It has found a healthy arrest of growth during the past ten days. THE SEASON turned from mild to frosty weather on Tuesday, DECEMBER this year has accepted from its commencement the relevance of a winter month, in which respect it differs from December his year. On the 7th of last December we were writing that the weather would be genial for October. "Pasture and all green food is abundant, which militates against the demand for cereal feeding stuffs." Subsequently there was a fall in the temperature, but the thermometer kept above freezing point. This, however, is the real character of the month. The mean average is 40 deg., and the normal condition is that of a cold thaw by day after a touch below 32 deg. at night. December is not a rainy month, 1% inches being the twenty-five years' average in London. Severe cold is much more usual in January than December, yet in 1850, from 17th to 20th December, the thermometer ranged between 15 deg. and 19 deg., and in the following year it fell to 12 deg. on Christmas Day. In 1870 December was extremely cold, and the belligerent armies of French and Germans suffered terrible losses. From the 25th to the end of the month the glass stood between 14 deg. and 20 deg. We have had no such cold in later Decembers, excepting only 7th and 8th December, 1879, when 16 deg. and 19 deg. were recorded.

Barley has been, during the past month, almost as active a trade as it was in October. The average price in London has remained rather high, 32s. 5d. being quoted on the first and 32s. 7d. on the last day of the month. These quotations mewhat nullify a remark of Mr. Squarey in presiding at the Surveyors' Institution. Mr. Squarey said—"A fall in the barley average from 36s. 1d. to 26s. 7d. must be attributed to degradation of quality. The efforts to obtain the best varieties and samples for seed are persistent. Every method and variation of cropping has been tried, and yet the Burton brewers and maltsters are paying 45s. to 5cs. per quarter for the rare best English and foreign barley, as against the mistrable average of 25s. of our markets." The price named by Mr. Squarey is not "the average of our markets," but at a good many places in the East of England 25s. is accepted for stained earn which was secured in bad condition during the wretchedly wet weather of latescured in bad condition during the wretchedly wet weather of latescured in bad condition during the wretchedly wet weather of latescured in bad even yellow of secondary quality even makes ever 30s. ENSILAGE adds steadily to its triumphs. Horses relish it, cattle fatten on it, and it has now been fed to sheep. Mr. Cubitt, a very well-known name in agriculture, writes to say that he has fel very well-known to the the best results. "The sheep greatly prefer it goo sheep on it with the best results. "The sheep greatly prefer it to hay, and do better with it, and on account of its moisture they to hay, and do better with it, and on account of its moisture they require less roots. Our winter hoggets are sold fat at about a year old, and are usually finished off with chaffed ensilage and pulped roots, the soft food being more readily eaten by sheep with their first teeth. The last two winters I have kept some ensilage over until the next winter, and I have not found it deteriorate in any way in quality. The sheep and cattle now fattening for our Christmas sale are using ensilage saved in June, 1888, in the rain of that wet season. Keeping it in our stone-built silos rather improves it after the first year."

MEMORANDA.—Our readers are asked to remember that the great Christmas Cattle Show opens at Islington on Monday next, the 5th inst., and remains open till Friday evening.—The Farmers' Club meet on Monday, at 6 P.M., at the Salisbury Square Hotel, to consider the very important subject of agricultural education. The Secretary, Mr. Druce, will open the discussion with a paper. The annual dinner of the Club is fixed for Tuesday, December 10th, at 6 P.M., immediately after the annual general meeting, which is fixed for four o'clock. The Committee on this occasion will have to announce that the balance in hand is 1,543%, and that there are something like 400 members. The annual meeting is robbed of much of its interest by the fact that the ordinary members of the Club have no voice in the selection of chairman or vice-chairman for 1890. We understand that the Committee will announce that their choice has fallen on Mr. Rix, of St. Albans, and Mr. Bowen Jones, of Shrewsbury, for these offices.

LITERARY NICKNAMES

Men of letters have displayed a singular fertility of invention in the nicknames, sobriques, and epithets, encomiastic, depreciatory, or critical, which they have bandied from one to the other. The subject is too wide for exhavitive survey in these columns, but a passing glance at it will convince the reader of its varied interests. To begin with: Democitius, the so-called "laughing philosopher," having been born at Abdera, in Thrace, the term, "an Abderite," or "an Abderitam," is often applied to him who makes ridicule the test of truth, or treats serious themes with lightness.

The "Academb" of Plato survives in the word "Academic," signifying a scholarly and polished form of literary effort—a favourite word with the late Matthew Arnold. By a strange extravagance of criticism, Henry Mackenzie, author of that exceedingly sentimental novel, "The Man of Feeling," has been styled "the Addison of the North," by the has little or nothing in common with the suave moralist of the Spectator. A like want of discrimination is shown in styling Sir Walter Scott "the Ariosto of the North"—though the phrase is Lord Byron's—and in implying that Pontus de Thiard, ralled "the French Anacreon," Walter Mapes, "the twelfth-century Anacreon," and Giovanni Meli, "the Sicilian Anacreon," have any real grounds of comparison with the Greek lyrist, except that, like him, they sing of love and wine. Herrick has more of the true Anacreonite flavour than either. English literature is sometimes supposed to boast its "Aristophanes" in Samuel Foote, a clever mimic and farceus but fatally inferior to the brilliant and daring wit who attacked Socrates, and covered even the Olympian gods with his bold ridicule.

"Elia," the immortal nom de plume of Charles Lamb, was adapted lyhim from the name of a "gay, light-hearted foreigner," who had been a clerk at the Old South Sea House in Charles Lamb's time. In the "Cockney School" were included Shelley, Keats, Hazlitt Leigh Hunt, and others. Never was term more infelicitous or unjust. By the "English Rabelais" Swift is sometimes meant and sometimes Sterne; Dr. Maginn was occasionally called (most unhappily) the "Modern Rabelais." George Crabbe is the "Poet of the Poor;" the "Poet Squab" was Rochester's nickname for Dryden. Smollett has particularised Dr. Johnson as "the Great Chain of Literature." He is also addressed as the "Great Moralist" and as the "Leviathan of Literature."

The reader will not need to be reminded that the "Great Magitian" was (and is) Sir Walter Scott; the "Matchless Orinda" was Mis. Catherine Philips, a graceful writer of the seventeenth century.

Alis. Catherine Philips, a graceiu with century.

The "Spasmodic School of Poets" was a term applied with more smartness than justice to "Festus" Bailey, Alexander Smith, and Sydney Pobell. Their peculiarities are amusingly satirised by the late Professor Aytoun in his "Frimilian; a Spasmodic Tragedy." The "Sattanic School" included Byron and Shelley.

The fine taste and elegant scholarship of Atticus, the friend of Cicero, enhance the value of the compliment which Pope paid to Addison in calling him the "English Atticus," though he afterwards more than neutralised it by the bitter satirical attack which concludes:—

Who would not laugh if such a name there be? Who would not weep if Atticus were he?

Bishop Heber, of Calcutta, has been distinguished as the "Christian Atticus," though the aptness of the designation seems more than doubtful. Elihu Burritt, blacksmith and linguist, was known as the "Learned Blacksmith."

The "Della Crusca School" was the term bestowed on some English residents at Florence, who, towards the close of the eighteenth century, wrote much bad prose and worse verse in a sickly, sentimental style. They afterwards returned to England, where they lived their little day, but were ultimately extinguished by the rough satire of William Gifford in his "Baviad" and "Mæviad."

SIX HUNDRED MILES UP THE YANG-TSE-KIANG

THE Yang-tse-kiang, the third largest river in the world, and more than three thousand miles long in all its windings, from its rise in the north-western mountains of China to its discharge into the Yellow Sea, is navigable by steamboat as far as Jehang—a thousand miles up from Shanghai.

There are three companies which run steamers up the river, and it was in one belonging to the China Navigation Company, the sand miles up from Shanghai.

There are three companies which run steamers up the river, and it was in one belonging to the China Navigation Company, the Nganking, a fine vessel of 3,000 tons, fitted up with every latest improvement, that we recently made the journey, to and fro, from Shanghai to Hankow. The distance is six hundred miles, and the trip there and back, which occupied nine days, proved in every way interesting and enjoyable.

Large numbers of "Chasus" go up every May to the river ports, and even as early as April we had quite a crowd of them in the Nganking. We had learned to look upon the "Chasu" with mingled fear and dread, for every one kept saying, apropos of our trip, "Better go early, and so avoid the 'Chasus'"—it was a great relief to our mind, therefore, to discover him, later on, to be neither more nor less than a simple tea-taster. Our "Chasus" were all Russians, and bound for Hankow, which is one of the largest marts on the river for the tea-trade. At the house of the hospitable Commissioner of Customs we tasted some tea which I should imagine for delicacy of flavour must be unequalled: it was some that he had received as a gift from a "chop" sent to the Emperor of Russia, and is not to be bought for money, being reserved exclusively for the use of the Imperial Court.

The Yang-tse-kiang possesses, to a great extent, the charm of variety. Owing to its floods, its opposing currents, and its soft and yielding soil, it is constantly changing its aspect; and what at one time is a shoal in a few years transforms itself into an island, or attaches itself to the mainland, to disappear, perhaps, as expeditiously as it arose.

At the delta of the river, opposite Wusung and twelve miles from yielding soil, it is constantly changing its aspect; and what at one time is a shoal in a few years transforms itself into an island, or attaches itself to the mainland, to disappear, perhaps, as expeditiously as it arose.

At the delta of the river, opposite Wusung and twelve miles from Shanghai, lies the largest alluvial island in the world—Tsung-Ming; this island is sixty miles long and ten wide, and possesses about a million of inhabitants, yet a few hundred years ago it was not in existence, and perhaps in a century or two more the water will again flow fathoms deep over the spot where it once flourished.

The first day of our journey the scenery was monotonous and uninteresting; the low, flat banks being too far distant to afford us even the poor excitement of the sight of a Chinaman's coffin. The casual way in which these coffins lie promiscuously about in China on the river banks is at first almost disconcerting to a stranger, but very soon one grows accustomed to the sight.

In the evening, at dinner, among other delicacies on the bill of fare was the "Samli," the far-famed white salmon of the Yang-tse-Kiang. Some one at table told us the same fish is found in the Hooghly, and that it is also similar to the American chad.

At sunset we came in sight of Chinkiang, where the Grand Canal crosses the river on its way from Hang-Chau to Pekin. We were disappointed at not being able to go on shore and visit the scene of the riots of the previous month, but the downward stream had possession of the Company's hulk, and so we were obliged to anchor till midnight at Silver Island, two miles away. Next morning we were awakened at daylight by a great rattling of chains, as the Nganking loosened her hold on the hulk, and swung out into the river on her way to the once celebrated but now insignificant and third-rate city of Nanking. The scenery soon began to get very pretty; hills rose on either side, and little villages and long stretches of peach-orchards broke the monotony of the low banks, while here and there on

All that day we passed walled towns built on the slope of the hill-side, and occasionally bristling with fortifications; and now and again we would see a group of children playing beside the water far from any signs of habitation, or a water-buffalo would appear to enliven the scene, but as a rule there was a still, desolate air over from any signs of habitation, or a water-bilialo would appear to enliven the scene, but as a rule there was a still, desolate air over everything.

In the evening we arrived at Wuhu, one of the Treaty Ports. There is nothing of much interest about this place, except that here the tide in the river ceases, also, it possesses an old decayed pagoda which is zealously guarded, because tradition says that when that pagoda falls, then falls Wuhu. If this prophecy is to be relied upon, Wuhu, judging from the appearance of the pagoda, is destined to have a very short reign of it.

Next day we passed close to the walled town of Nganking. It wore a peaceful air in the early morning—the drooping willows and brown sails of the fishing-junks beneath the old grey wall, and the slender pagodas, and the quaint joss-houses within the city, rising from amid green foliage, lent a pretty and picturesque charm to the scene; but those who could read between the lines, and who knew what an amount of degradation, squalor, and vice a Chinese town is capable of containing, were not deceived by this outward appearance of slumbrous calm and peace. It was horrible to think that even as we looked some poor wretch behind those walls might be undergoing tortures indescribable.

We were all glad to see the last of Nganking, for this suggestion of torture, lightly thrown out by some one, recalled to us too vividly for our mental comfort a description of the punishment at Canton of a State offender, which we had read recently in a Shanghai paper. The wretched man had been buried up to his neck in sand close by a convenient ant-hill; his mouth had then been tied open and his face plentifully besmeared with treacle, a train of which, so that no mistake might be made, having then been laid to the ant-hill.

After we had left Nganking some miles behind us, the Captain

After we had left Nganking some miles behind us, the Captain pointed out the place, close to where we were then passing, in eight fathoms of water, where, sixteen years before, there had been a populous island, two miles long, covered with farms and stock. Even as lately as three years ago, he said, all traces of the land had not disappeared; now there is nothing to mark the spot but a waste of waters. He further told us that the river had in the last month risen thirty feet, and yet, about a half-mile away, across some green meadows, we noticed a bank of rocky cliffs, the high watermark on which, some distance up, showed the height to which the waters might still rise.

After leaving Tunglin, the scenery for the first time began to be wild, rugged, and rocky. Just before dusk we passed within a stone's throw of the "Little Orphan," a pretty little wooded island, surmounted by a Joss House and a Monastery, from the walls of which a melancholy-eyed priest looked down; and then a little further on we passed the "Great Orphan," standing like a guardian at the entrance to Lake Poyang. This lake is fifty miles long, and the scenery on it is said to be extremely beautiful; it has large towns and extensive manufactories on its shores, but as yet is closed to European trade. That night we passed Tenikiang, so famous for its pottery, and in the neighbourhood of which both gold and silver are found, and next morning we arrived at Hankow, and dropped anchor alongside the Company's hulk. Between Nganking and Hankow the river rises higher than in any other part, and although generally about three-quarters of a mile across, it has been known to reach below Hankow, a width of twenty miles, forming one vast sheet of water with no land visible on either side. These floods naturally cause great distress to the villagers and farmers. It is not at all an uncommon thing for the inhabitants of Hankow to be flooded out of their houses. Sometimes they have to migrate to Wuchang, which lies on the higher ground, on the opposite side of the river.

After a three days' stay, during which time we were most hospitably entertained, we left Hankow, and started on our return trip to Shanghai. This time we landed at Chinkiang, and vi friends managed to break, as they fied for safety to the steamer Kiangyu, then in harbour.

It is marvellous how they managed to get through a wall eight feet high and proportionately thick in such a short space of time; but, perhaps, the sound of the rioters as they clamoured, mad with excitement, at the gates below, may have helped them somewhat. The Chinese Government have paid, willingly enough, the indemnity demanded for the damage sustained, and affairs seem to have settled down quietly again, but there are those who shake their heads, and say there should always be a gunboat stationed on the river.

their heads, and say there should always be a gunboat stationed on the river.

Poor Chinkiang has undergone four other sieges since that memorable and terrible one in 1842, during the war between England and China. Throughout the whole of the Taiping Rebellion, it was continually suffering from dissensions within and assaults without; twice it was taken by the rebels and twice retaken by the Imperialists, till at one time there was hardly a house left standing. Hankow also suffered terribly during this civil war, being six times taken by assault, while at Nganking, during one of the sieges, human flesh, says Williams, in his "Middle Kingdom," was sold on the butchers' stalls. He further states that 20,000,000 lives were lost in connection with the Taiping Rebellion, during the fifteen years it lasted.

SKETCHES IN THE LAW COURTS-II.

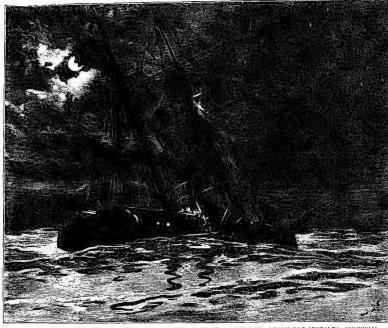

OF all the courts, the Admiralty Court is perhaps the least known, and yet the best worth knowing. Thrilling stories of the sea are often told here, and Mr. Justice Butt sitting with or without the Trinity Masters has no easy task in deciding the rights and wrongs of many a case on the conflicting evidence before him. There is a hearty partisanship among seafaring men which seems to render it impossible for them to give unbiassed evidence. In "running-down cases" and the like the stories of both sides are always categorical down to the minutest details, and all the witnesses stick to their version with a pertinacity which would be worthy of the highest praise if it did not often involve perjury. The "rule of the road"—as the regulations governing navigation are known—is, for all its technicalities, so clear as to leave little room for prevarication, and witnesses on each side in collision cases, therefore, swear to a consistent story which goes to show that it was the other vessel which was in fault. We do not suppose there ever was a case of the kind heard in the Admiralty Court in which the witnesses on both sides did not asseverate that the lights on their vessel were all ri-': and the helm as it ought to be.

One of our illustrations shows a typical group of "sale," waiting for

do not suppose there ever was a case of the kind heard in the Admiralty Court in which the witnesses on both sides did not asseverate that the lights on their vessel were all ring and the helm as it ought to be.

One of our illustrations shows a typical group of "sal." waiting for the verdict. The Judge has retired with the Elder Brethren to decide the momentous question "Who is to blame?" It is easy to understand the anxiety of the masters and mates who are discussing the case. An adverse verdict means, perhaps, the cancelling or suspension of their certificates, and a master who is found to have made an error of judgment is lucky if he is granted a mate's certificate during the period of probation which must elapse before his "rating" is restored to him. There are, indeed, few callings where the consequences of mistake, made almost certainly under circumstances of the greatest difficulty, are so serious. The High Court of Admiralty has since 1873 been a branch of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice But although its procedure has undergone some formal changes it still preserves its exclusive jurisdiction, and its rules in all such cases as damages by collision at sea now prevail over those of the Common Law Courts. Its ancient prerogatives, therefore, have by no means been abrogated by its consolidation with the other Divisions of the High Court.

This is not the place to trace the origin and jurisdiction of the old High Court of Admiralty, but it is curious to know that it is supposed to date back to the time of Edward III. It was held before the Lord High Admiral of England, or his deputy, and, its procedure being based on the civil law, it sat at Doctors' Commons. The Prize Court, where vessels captured at sea had to be condemned as prize by the law of nations, so as to bar the original owners, was one of its most important Divisions. Its decisions obtained a world-wide reputation in the time of Lord Stowell. It was of these that Defoe wrote when he declared that "Engla

Now that mot European rulers have opened the winter political season with speeches from the Throne, President Harrison reviews the policy of the UNITED STATES in his Message to Congress. The President reports most favourably on the general situation, both international and domestic. He lays particular stress on the satisfactory relations with Great Britain, all "Anglo-American difficulties being either in abeyance or amicably adjusted," while he further hopes that the troublous Canadian Fishery question will soon be equitably settled, as little friction occurred during the past season. A new and enlarged Extradition Treaty with Great Britain is promised, and the President further touches lightly on the settlement of naturalisation disputes, the success of the Samoan Treaty, and the meeting of the Pan-American Congress, which he trusts will improve peace and commerce throughout the American continent. In home affairs the continued Treasury surplus is the most important item, being reckoned this year at nearly nine millions steeling. Few countries are perplexed by too much money, but in this case the surplus "is a disturbing element in business." As a pledged Protectionist, President Harrison cannot recommend solving the difficulty by remitting import duties, but he proposes that the tariff should be slightly revised, and that Congress should "consider how to reduce the receipts to the needs of the Government." Some of this superfluous money can be used for the increase of naval and coast defence, together with the improvement of the mercantile marine, while further national aid might also be afforded to education. The speech did not excite much enthusiasm in Congress, where the Republicans have elected their nominee—Mr. Thomas Reed—as Speaker. Indeed the American public care less about the Presidential Message than for the commercial disasters entailed by the recent frees in New England. Whilst Lynn was still counting the cost of her conflagration, which almost obliterated her business section, a tremendous fire

Colonial enthusiasm still runs high in GERMANY, domestic affairs leing quite put in the background by events in East Africa. Thanks to the details of Major Wissmann's successes, and the generally favourable accounts from the German Protectorate, the Government have obtained all the colonial credits required. Whilst appealing for the Supplementary Vote for the Wissmann Expedition, Count Herbert Bismarck announced that in all future actions Germany will follow the policy of going hand in hand with the English, and of energetically repressing slavery. He pointed out that the natives hailed Major Wissmann as their liberator from Arab tyranny, and were on most friendly terms with the Germans, so that trade will shortly be carried on in safety. The expedition marched back from Mpwapwa to Bagamoyo in eleven days—half the time usually taken by caravans—which proves that Europeans suffer little from the climate when properly equipped and fed. Emperor William is specially delighted with these colonial successes, and has ordained extra rewards for the officers and men who have served in the East African blockade and at Samoa; whilst His Majesty and the Court attended in State some African tableaux vivants at Berlin, organised towards establishing a German hospital at Zanzibar. The unpleasant side of the colonial picture appears in fresh reports of Dr. Peters's death, which have again depressed his friends. Turning to home matters, Count von Moltke has been warmly congratulated on attaining the fiftieth anniversary of his investiture with the Order pour la Mérite. The Emperor gave a special Court banquet in his honour, and presented him with the Crown of the Order in diamonds, toasting the General as "the palladium of my subjects and the terror of my enemies." His Majesty has been shooting in Silesia, and goes to Darmstadt this week. The new Imperial Bank Bill has passed the Reichstag; and an important State trial has been held at Weimar, where a lawyer, Herr Harmening, has been sentenced to six months' imprisonment for li France is a trifle dull, her politics at present being of little outside interest. The Government has once more been defeated in the Chamber—this time over the employment of women for night work—but, as the dispute was not political, the Cabinet was not affected, beyond being indignant at again being put in the minority. The only other Parliamentary discussion of importance related to the recognition of the new Brazilian Republic, M. Spuller explaining that France merely maintained friendly relations with the Provisional Government until asked for formal recognition. The validation of the elections continues, and the Committee deputed to examine M. Joffrin's eligibility have at last resolved to recommend his election being accepted, after coming to several contradictory decisions. Whether this view will be taken by the House is doubtful, and the Boulangists, in readiness for a refusal, are going an masse to Jersey on the 15th inst. to consult with the General, who proposes to offer himself again for election if M. Joffrin is rejected. However, the Boulangists seem inclined to adopt more reasonable views, judging from the remarks of M. Déroulède at Champigny, where the party made a demonstration on the universary of the battle in which their leader was wounded in 1870. They avoided clashing with the Government manifestation which was held immediately afterwards. Parts is experiencing that pool, which raises the skaters' hopes, but somewhat chilled he effect of the grand file at the Parts Central Market, celebrating the introduction of the electric light. However, the Dames de la Ialle welcomed the Minister of Public Works, and the whole market community danced nearly all night with much vigour.

The Anti-Slavery Conference in Belgium proceeds favourably, he Powers being agreed on the main principles of the action equired, though they differ widely respecting the details. The Belgian Plenipotentiaries propose a lengthy programme of preentive measures, the most important items being that the Powers hall assist each other in the repression of the slave-trade, and that hey may delegate this mission to private enterprise if necessary.

The committee for repressing slave-traffic on land are considering the establishment of stations in the interior, provided with a sufficient force of men to overcome the slave-hunters, while the right of search at sea arouses much conflicting opinion in the sub-committee. England suggests that ships of war belonging to civilised Powers should be allowed to search the native craft throughout the length of the East African coast—from the Persian Gulf to Madagascar. The rival claims of England and Portugal in the Zambesi district nearly caused serious trouble among the delegates, but the dispute was eventually settled amicably, although the Portuguese representatives still enleavour to bring forward their territorial rights, centrary to the rules of the Conference. They are only echoing public opinion in Lisbon, which has been roused by Lord Salisbury's despatch to assert warmly the national claims in Africa. The Portuguese Government have now issued a circular to the Powers justifying their action in the Zambesi region.

The ex-Emperor of Brazil is daily expected at Lisbon, having touched Portuguese territory on Sunday at Cape St. Vincent. Dom Pedro refused to discuss the Revolution, though he stated that he had been well treated throughout. Royal honours were paid to him at St. Vincent, and will be repeated at Lisbon, as Portugal has not yet recognised the Brazilian Republic, while King Charles is most anxious to entertain the Imperial Family in one of the Royal palaces, notwithstanding the ex-Emperor's wish to stay quietly at a hotel. No further details of the Revolution have been received, but it is generally acknowledged that Dom Pedro's rule had long been too lax and gentle to cope with the spread of Republican doctrines, while the unpopularity of the Comte and Comtesse d'Eu hastened the downfall of the Empire. So far, the new Brazilian Republic remains quiet enough, but slight symptoms of disturbance have appeared, such as the popular irritation at the Provisional Government restoring the old national flag.

In Eastern Europe there seems little prospect of Turkey honestly redressing Armenian grievances, judging by the example of Moussa Bey. That notorious Kurdish chief has been acquitted after a most partial trial, where the Public Prosecutor took the side of the accused, amid most distinct evidence of Moussa's cruelty. A second trial on fresh charges will follow in the spring, but the present verdict discourages all hopes of a fair hearing. Nor does the Porte deal more kindly with Crete, for, though the Amnesty is on its way, it has not yet come into force, and the delay enables the Courts-Martial in the island to pronounce heavy sentences on the rebels—many of whom are safe in Greece. The Turkish troops and the Cretans continue on very bad terms, serious collisions occurring at Sphakia. Further, Turkey is disputing with Servian Cabinet have formally protested against the ex-King's outspoken criticisms on his late kingdom. They hint that if he does not mod rate his language he will not be allowed to re-enter the country.

In India Prince Albert Victor continues his round of sight-seeing with some slight monotony, the visits to each State and native ruler including the same programme of official reception, banquet and ball, or laying some foundation-stone, with the alternative of a review. The Prince, however, much enjoyed the elephant hunting in Mysore, although he narrowly escaped injury from an infuriated elephant, which was frightened away only just in time by Colonel Sanderson. After visiting Bangalore Prince Albert Victor went to Tinnevelly and to Travancore for some big-game shooting. Great preparations are being made for his reception at Calcutta, where the Viceroy has now returned from his frontier tour, stopping on the way at Lahore to advocate raising the educational standard. Now that the cool weather has begun, the various military expeditions in BURMA are setting out. The Southern column of the Chin expedition will shortly cross the frontier to meet the Lushai column at Hoka, and will first enter the territory of the Bonthes, famous headhunters. Major Raikes has interviewed the heads of the Tashon Chin tribes to clear the way for the British troops, who are thoroughly to survey the country, besides exacting compensation for all outrages. The Bhamo Expedition against the Kachyens leaves this week, and the dacoits are being hunted with fresh activity. Survey parties will also be despatched to consider the practicability of two important railways, running westward to the Chindwin River, and eastward to the Shan States.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The financial situation in ITALY is most unfavourable, the Budget just presented showing a considerable deficit. The towns are as poor as the Government, notably Rome, and present appearances do not confirm the favourable view of industrial prosperity taken in the King's recent speech.—AUSTRIA promises a fair surplus in her Budget, brought forward at the opening of the Reichsrath on Tuesday.—Parliamentary disorder reigns supreme in HUNGARY, and the unseemly attacks on M. Tisza in the Diet have turned public opinion in favour of the Premier. The Ministerial party wish to reform the rules of debate to prevent these disgraceful scenes, while M. Tisza announces that he does not intend to resign, despite all opposition. The Bohemian Diet has been nearly as excited over the memory of John Huss, and a regular propaganda is being carried on to erect monuments to the martyred Reformer.—In EGYPT the Government have decided to allow trade with the Soudan, arms and grain excepted.—The scheme of Australian Federation grows apace. New SOUTH WALES accepts the Victorian Premier's suggestion of meeting the members of the Federal Council to discuss the question, Sir H. Parkes, however, desiring that the meeting should be informal, and simply a preliminary consultation. He still thinks that any representatives of a body authorised to discuss the Unification of the Colonies should be elected by the several Australian Parliaments, and repeats that he is not responsible for New South Wales holding aloof from the Federal Council. Public opinion, says the Premier, shows that the time is ripe for laying wide and deep the foundations of a new structure of Government.—The new Governor of VICTORIA, Lord Hopetoun, has reached Melbourne.—In SOUTH AFRICA, the chief white colonists in Swaziland have met the Commissioners, and agreed to appoint a committee of five to represent their interests, the committee to be elected by a mass meeting on the 16th inst. THE QUEEN leaves Windsor on the 18th inst. to spend Christmas at Osborne. On the previous Saturday there will be the usual family gathering at the Castle for the annual Service in memory of the Prince Consort and Princess Alice on the anniversary of their deaths. Meanwhile, the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh have been staying with Her Majesty, the Duchess remaining until Monday, while the Duke left a few days earlier. On Saturday the Duc de Nemours lunched with the Queen, and Bishop Barry and Sir W. Jenner joined the Royal party at dinner. Next morning

Her Majesty and the Princesses attended Divine Service in the private chapel, where Bishop Barry preached, the Bishop, with the Dean of Windsor, again dining with the Queen in the evening. The Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, Lord Ashbourne, and Sir A. Hardinge were Her Majesty's guests on Monday, while on Tuesday the Queen entertained Princess Louise and Lord Lorne, the Duke and Duchess of Teck, with Princess Victoria and Prince Francis, and Lord and Lady Zetland. Princess Beatrice visited Reading to open a bazaar in aid of the restoration of Holy Trinity Church.

The Prince and Princess of Wales are entertaining their first house-party at Sandringham this season. The Prince came up to town at the end of last week to see the Duke of Edinburgh, who subsequently went down to Sandringham to stay. Sunday was the Princess of Wales' forty-fifth birthday, and although all festivities were deferred till Monday, the Duke and Duchess of Fife spent the day with the Royal party, and accompanied them to the morning Service at St. Mary Magdalen, where Canon Dalton preached. On Monday the bells were rung and salutes fired in honour of the Princess, and the children on the Royal estate had their annual tea in the Mews, the Prince and Princess and family being present. The Duchess of Edinburgh, the Comte and Comtesse de Paris, with Princess Hélène, the Duc de Chartres, and other guests arrived during the day, and the Princes, with the gentlemen of the party, have since been shooting over the Sandringham preserves, the ladies generally joining the sportsmen at lunch. Last (Friday) night the Prince and Princess would give their annual County Ball, and the party breaks up to-day (Saturday). The Prince leaves on Monday for Easton Lodge, Dunmow, to stay with Lord and Lady Brooke, and, with the Princess, will go to Windsor at the end of the week.

The Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh spend next week with Mr. and Mrs. Tyssen-Amherst at Didlington Hall, Norfolk. They return to Coburg on the 18th inst.—Princess Louise has opened the Kensington Central Public Library. On Tuesday she presided over the Christmas Sale of the Ladies' Work Society, of which she is the head, and witnessed the wedding of Miss Maria Keppel and Lieutenant Hamilton.—The Duchess of Albany on Saturday distributed the medals and certificates to the successful students belonging to the Polytechnic classes of the St John's Ambulance Association.—Prince Henry of Battenberg has gone to Corfu, after spending a few

DEATH OF MR. FREDERIC CLAY.—The death of Mr. F. Clay, after a long and wearisome illness, will be lamented by the melodyloving public, although his many friends cannot but look upon it in the light of a happy release from the affliction under which he suffered. It will be recollected that Mr. Clay in the height of his popularity, and apparently in the best of health, was, six years ago, stricken down in the streets of London with paralysis. The stroke fell upon him on the night following the production of The Golden Ring in 1883, when, while actually conversing with his collaborator Mr. Sims about the favourable Press notices, he reeled, and fell into his friend's arms. For years he lay practically speechless, and a brief pencilled note from time to time addressed to his intimates was his only communication with the outer world. Last Sunday week he died, and on Friday of last week, in the presence of a small assemblage of friends, including Sir Arthur Sullivan, Mr. Bancroft, and others, there were laid in the catacombs at Brompton the mortal remains of one who, by his talent, and kindness of heart, had won the affection of all who had ever been brought into business or social relations with him. Frederic Clay was born in Paris on August 3, 1838, and was a pupil for music of Molique and Hauptmann. In early years he was a clerk in the Treasury Department, and was employed in many a delicate and confidential mission by Mr. Gladstone. He afterwards became private secretary to Lord Beaconsfield, but finally forsook political life for music. His compositions were mostly of a light and lyrical character, his genius not being suited to more dramatic music. Among his twelve comic operas, or operettas, the best known are the two he wrote in association with Mr. Gilbert, that is to say, Ages Ago, for the old Gallery of Illustration in 1869, and The Princess Toto in 1875. Happy Arcadia and Don Quixote likewise contained some excellent music, while Lalla Rookh, composed for the Brighton Festival of 1877, will be recollected was indeed remarkable amongst his compeers for his wonderful gilt of melody. He likewise had a strong sense of humour, and those privileged to know them in private life will recollect with pleasure the burlesque duets which he and Sir Arthur Sullivan used to improvise on the pianoforte, to the delight of all who heard them. ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.—Sir Arthur Sullivan's incidental music, written for the performance of Macheth at the Lyccum Theatre last year, was given for the first time in a London concertroom at the Crystal Palace on Saturday. The overture, which contains many themes subsequently used to emphasise situations in the tragedy, was admirably performed by Mr. Manns' orchestra. The programme also included selections from Euryanthe, in which Mr. and Mrs. Henschel took part, Brahms' Symphony in D, and Mr. Hamish M'Cunn's Ship o' the Fiend.—The name of the young German composer, Herr Richard Strauss, who has recently gained high reputation in Germany, appeared for the first time in a London orchestral programme at the Symphony Concert last week. Unfortunately, the two movements given from the Symphonic Phantasy, Aus Italien, were written when Herr Strauss was a boy of eighteen, and the music is of that pretentious and almost unintelligible character of which promising young composers of that age have already given us many awful examples. The two movements are intended to depict life "On the Campagna" and "On the Shore at Sorrento," while two other movements, headed respectively "In Rome's Ruins" and "Neapolitan Popular Life," were omitted by Mr. Henschel. The programme also included Schumann's Symphony in D Minor, which would have gone better for another reharsal, and Brahms' Variations on a theme by Haydn.—On Wednesday the Westminster Orchestra, an Association in which the firm of Messrs. Broadwood take considerable interest, gave a concert, at which a Haydn symphony, Weber's Concertstück, played by Miss Josephine Lawrence, and other works were announced.

ORATORIO PERFORMANCES.—Elijah was given last Wednesday for the only time at St. James's Hall this year. The performance by a scratch orchestra and chorus, and on behalf of the Royal Society of Musicians, should be exempt from criticism. Its best features were the singing of Mr. Watkin Mills of the music of the prophet, and of Misses Anna Williams and Hilda Wilson.—On Monday the Highbury Philharmonic Society announced a performance of Dr. Parry's Ode on St. Cecilia's Day and Sullivan's Golden Legend.—

On Sunday, at the People's Palace, a performance was given by the orchestra and choir of that institution of Sterndale Bennett's Woman of Samaria.—On Tuesday Elijah: was given by the New Court Choral Society.—At St. Paul's Cathedral, as usual on the first Tuesday in Advent, Spohr's Last Judgment was performed under the direction of Dr. Martin. It attracted a rather smaller congregation than when Sir John Stainer used to give his masterly organ version of the orchestral part.—On Wednesday the Royal Choral Society announced a second performance in London of M. Benoit's Lucifer, which we fully described on its first production under Mr. Barnby last spring. The Belgian baritone, M. Blauwaert, came over specially from Brussels to play the titular character.

CHAMBER CONCERTS.—There have been no novelties at the Popular Concerts, but some of the most attractive works were included in the programmes of the past week. Among them was Mozart's celebrated Quintet in G minor, No. 6, which opened the concert on Saturday, in the course of which Madame De Fachmann, whose rapid improvement in her profession is most marked, gave an exceedingly interesting reading of Schubert's so-called "Fantasia" sonata in G.—On Monday the announcement of Schumann's pianoforte quintet sufficed to crowd St. James's Hall, although the performance by Miss Davies, Lady Hallé, Messrs. Straus and Piatti, was hardly so good as usual. The scheme also included Mendelssohn's famous posthumous quintet in B flat, Op. 87.—A Schubert Concert was given last week by Messrs. Max Heinrich and Schönberger, the pianist affording an exceedingly good rendering of the Sonata in A minor, Op. 42, and of several of the Impromptus; while Mr. Heinrich, whose artistic style is admirably suited to this music, sang several of Schubert's songs, including the "Erl King."—The principal item of the programme of the Royal College Concert on Thursday last was Brahms' Sextet.—The members of the Musical Guild have likewise given two more concerts, and five Scottish concerts in hono been upwards of the other performances of the week (there have been upwards thirty-five regular concerts), they must perforce be left unnoticed.

NOTES AND NEWS.—The Archbishop of Canterbury has conferred the honorary degree of Mus. Doc. Cantuar. upon the well-known organist, Mr. E. H. Turpin.—Berlioz's Childhood of Christ will be performed at the Royal College of Music, under Professor Stanford, on the 20th inst.—On Saturday last M. Rubinstein celebrated his sixtieth birthday. A large number of telegrams and messages congratulating him were received.—The new Sullivan and Gilbert opera will be produced at the Savoy Theatre this (Saturday) night

(Saturday) night.

M. SARDOU'S La Torca is not in the category of plays that "bathe the drooping spirits in delight." Terror and pity rather than pleasurable emotion are the passions that it awakens; and there is undoubtedly some ground for the complaint that it more than once oversteps the limits which true art imposes in depiciting painful and revolting subjects. Nevertheless, the sombre tale of the lovers of the young Republican painter, Cavaradossi, and the passionate cantatrice Floria Torse, when powerfully playe1, a singular fascination. When Mr. Hare proposed to produce Messrs, Grove and Hamilton's version, there were prophets of evil who shook their heads and said it "would never do." To be endured by the English public it must be in a foreign tongue which hides and excuses much, and it must be aided by the soft caressing tones and the picturesque witchery of Madame Sarah Bernhardt. A first-night trial at the GARRICK has served entirely to falsily these gloomy forebodings. Mrs. Bernard Beere's triumph that evening was undoubtedly greater than anything she had hitherto achieved—greater, perhaps, than anything that her most enthusiastic almieres had anticipated. There is but one thing wanting to her splendid impersonation—that is a somewhat juster measure of her powers, a finer sense of proportion, a truer appreciation of that golden maxim that the details of a performance are judged—whether instinctively by the simple playgoer or analytically by the erritic matters little—not only by their merit; in themselves, but also by their total effect. There are performers who believe in working, as they express it, "to a climax." These will ask us, very pertitionally, who will believe in violent parroxymas in the later senes if the performer begins by screaming in the first act? Hence as weather than a nice adjustment throughout of light and shade—a watchful regard to the rule that one strong exhibition of passion shall not be permitted to impair the effect of another.

It is here only that Mrs. Bernard Beere can be said in any deg ceptible relation to the strange incoherent series of violent situations in which Miss Amy Roselle, Mr. Herbert, Mr. Barnes, and the other members of the company are involved. Respectfully and attentively followed at first, the play ended in provoking ill-timed laughter, and it is to be feared that its shortcomings are beyond redamption.

An even more emphatic condemnation fell to the lot of The Spy, a Story of the American Rebellion, brought out at the Novelly Theatre on the same evening by Mr. George Turner, an American actor, who has given convincing proof of his courageous self-confidence by taking on himself the management of that ill-starred house. The play proved to be a farrago of tall talk and absurd incidents. Mr. Turner, however, who played a leading part in the piece seems to have capabilities as an actor, and a similar remark applies to Miss Alice Raynor, who also appeared on the occasion.

The Hogarthian period has furnished the scenic artists of the VAUDEVILLE with some good opportunities for the illustration of Mr. Buchanan's forthcoming version of Clarissa Harlowe. Covent Garden Market at daybreak will be one of the scenes. It will show the old jumble of sheds with the surrounding "piazza"—in the strangely perverted popular significance of that word. An old dairy farm with its dairy folk in the costume of George II.'s time will also furnish a very pretty pastoral scene.

Mr. George Alexander, late of Mr. Irving's company, and now of the ADELPHI, will become the manager of the AVENUE Theatre in February next.

Mr. Buchanan's new play Man and the Woman will be produced at a CRITERION matinée "for copyright purposes" on the 17th inst. The leading part will be played by Miss Myra Kemble, an actress of some note in the Australian colonies.

Little Lord Fauntleroy is coming to town. Miss Vera Beringer will resume her matinée performances a few days before Christmas, at the Opera Comique, and will supplement these by a dramatic recitation.

Mr. Dion Boucicault claims to have been one of the first to introduce realities on the stage; but, instead of glorifying in this fact, he is stricken with remorse. So excessive has the rage for realism become, that he expresses a conviction that it "would be better for the drama to return to the primitive conditions of the Shakespearian period."

Mr. Benson's forthcoming revival of A Midsummer Night's Dream will be produced at the GLOBE Theatre on or about Thursday, the 19th inst.

An English version of Meilhac's Décoré will shortly be produced at the COMEDY Theatre.

The demolition of the old OLYMPIC has not yet commenced; yet the new house, which will be much larger, is expected to be ready for Mr. Wilson Barrett next September. Mr. Barrett will open with a new play, of which he is the author, founded on The Bondman.

Matinee performances of The Dead Heart will be given by Mr. Irving on Monday and Tuesday, the 23rd and 24th inst. As there are limits to the physical powers even of modern actors, there will be no evening performances on those days.

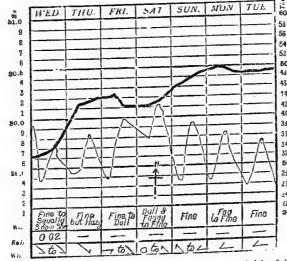

The theatrical event of the week is of course the reopening this evening of the SAVOY with Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan's new comic opera, which, as all the world has heard, tells the story of two Venetian gondoliers married to two peasant girls, who (the gondoliers, not the peasant girls) are one or other (if they could only know which) heirs to the island-kingdom of Barataria. The title of this latest effort of Mr. Gilbert's comic genius will have been divulged by the time that these lines reach the eyes of our readers.

MR. AND MRS. GERMAN REED'S ENTERTAINMENT.—On Monday evening, December 9th, Messrs. Alfred German Reed and Corney Grain will produce a new piece by Mr. Walter Frith, the music by King Hall, entitled The Verger. The performance will conclude with Mr. Corney Grain's successful musical sketch "I've Taken a House."

REMARKS.—The weather of the past week has been somewhat rough, showery, and unsettled in the West and North-West, while in most other places fair to fine dry and very cold conditions have prevailed. During the first three days an area of high pressure moved from the West of Ireland to the West of France, while systems of low readings were found over various parts of the France, while systems of low readings were found over various parts of the Continent. Steep gradients for Northerly winds or gales were experienced at first in the West, and moderate breezes from the same quarter elsewhere, but as the anticyclone travelled South-Eastwards, the winds became more Westerly the anticyclone travelled South-Eastwards, the winds became more Westerly generally, and moderated considerably. Showers of cold rain, snow, or half were very prevalent at first, but gradually improving weather followed, and by Friday (20th ult.) the sky had cleared over a great part of the country. By Saturday morning (30th ult.) the high pressure over the South of France had become both diminished in height, and much smaller, while from this date onward some large depressions skirted our Western Coasts in a Northerly direction. Meanwhile a long band of high readings moved down from Scandinavia to the neighbourhood of Germany. Thus, while the weather again Scandinavia to the neighbourhood of Germany. THE FESTIVAL OF OLD MAIDS was kept last week in Paris, on St. Catherine's Day—the patroness of spinsters. There are now 188,336 old maids in the French capital, as every unmarried Frenchwoman over twenty-five years of age is said to "coiffer Ste. Cathérine"—dressing the hair of the image of that saint being a privilege traditionally reserved for ladies vowed to single blessedness.

Australian Boys are specially fond of racing, and youngsters not yet in their teens will often make regular books at the local meetings. At Cairns, in Queensland, the lads have organised a series of goat races, with a programme exactly copied from the regular sporting meetings, and including a Maiden Plate, Ladies' Cup, and so forth.

The forthcoming Sporting Exhibition at the Grosvenor Gallery opens early in January. The old pastime of hawking will be especially well represented, every variety of falcon being shown, together with the implements of the chase and curious old books and pictures bearing on falconry. Sporting pictures will range from the time of Albert Dürer to the present day; while arms, trophies, and plate are to be included in the display.

TRADES UNIONISM for match-box makers is one of the latest philanthropic ideas. A highly successful meeting with this object in view was held a short time ago in the East End. The Rev. Osborne Jay, Vicar of Holy Trinity, Shoreditch, Lady Dilke, and Mr. Pickersgill, M.P., were among the speakers. Many terrible instances were given of the cruel way in which the workers are "sweated." One girl was said to have worked sixty-five hours for the miserable pittance of 2s. 6d. A resolution in favour of a Union being formed was carried unanimously. We hope to hear soon that it is actually started.

The German Stace is sharply looked after by the Emperor

The German Stace is sharply looked after by the Emperor William, who has just forbidden the production of a historical play by Herr Von Wildenbruch, to avoid wounding Austrian susceptibilities. The piece—General Feld Oberst—deals with the events of 1620, when the Protestant Brandenburg Margrave opposed the Hapsburg and Catholic influences. Usually, the Emperor favours historical plays, and he has taken special interest in a National Popular Theatre just opened at Worms, which is to be devoted to patriotic dramas. The building is modelled on the Wagner Theatre at Bayreuth, and our own Shakespearian Theatre at Stratford-on-Avon.

INDIAN AND BURMESE THIEVES are curiously classified in a native work recently issued. The author divides the robbers into thirty-seven grades, and minutely describes their operations under most graphic names. Here are a few samples—the "Dead child-using thief," the "Tiger-growling imitating thief," the "Dreadful strangling Thug," the "Inconsiderate and fearless thief," the "Lamplight-dimming and snake-producing wick thief," the "Dreadful back-water pirate," the "Giant-like puckey, or the wonderful thought-speed travelling thief," the "Pillow, portmanteau, bed, bundle, and mattress thisf," and the "Reckless but remarkably tender-hearted and moral-dagger thief."

THE PARIS EXHIBITION was finally closed on Sunday, the public being no longer allowed to enter to buy exhibits or carry away their purchases. Since November 6th—the formal closing day—III,000 admissions are recorded, an average of 2,000 daily, except on Sunday, November 24th, when the entries suddenly increased to 8,000. The Eiffel Tower was also shut for the winter on Sunday, after a grand banquet had been given on the first platform by the President of the Paris Cab Company, M. Bixio, who entertained all the officials of the Company, with seventy-five of the oldest and most respected drivers. M. Bixio has just received the Legion of Honour, so his subordinates presented him with a cross set with diamonds to commemorate the event. The French Railway Companies have every reason to be grateful to the Exhibition, for their receipts during the six months from May to November exceeded by nearly three and a shalf millions sterling those of the corresponding period in 1888. THE PARIS EXHIBITION was finally closed on Sunday, the public

The Influenza Epidemic, which has prostrated half the population of St. Petersburg, has spread to Siberia and to many Russian cities, notably Moscow. Though not dangerous, it is most painful and depressing, and generally lasts a week. The Czar, Czarina, and two of their children, and the British Ambassador and his staff, are the latest victims. Apparently the malady results from the mild wet autumn, so the St. Petersburgers long for frost and snow to drive it away; while they are further alarmed by the doctors prophesying that cholera, or some severe disease, will certainly follow in the spring. Five previous similar epidemics have been succeeded by cholera; and, as the latter disease has broken out in Persia, the outlook is not encouraging. Epidemic influenza has been known in Europe since the twelfth century, but first received its present name from the severe outbreaks in Italy in 1741. In Eng'and four violent epidemics have occurred during this century—in 1803, 1833, 1837, and 1847. The last was very fatal, 1,739 persons dying out of the quarter of a million attacked in London.

LONDON MORTALITY increased again last week. The deaths numbered 1,448 against 1,376 during the previous seven days, being a rise of 72, although 286 below the average, while the death-rate went up to 17'4 per 1,000. The fatal cases of scarlet-fever advanced to 19 (an increase of 2), but while the mortality is low, the epidemic continues high, 1,829 patients being under treatment in the London Hospitals at the end of last week. Diphtheria also increased again—33 fatalities being recorded—an advance of 3.

THE MARTIN MEMORIAL

Our readers will remember the brutal murder whi h was committed on Sunday, February 3rd, at Derrybeg Chapel, near Gweedore. District-Inspector Martin had been sent with a small body of police to arrest Father James McFadden on a charge under the Crimes Act. After the service, the people did not, as usual, disperse, but remained about the chapel-yard. The chapeldoor was then locked, but, after three men had gone from the chapel-yard to see if the coast was clear, the chapel-door was opened, and Mr. McFadden came out. He was arrested, after which he broke away. A terrible struggle up the pathway took place, and Mr. Martin had regained possession of his prisoner, when he received from behind a crushing blow on the back of his head. It sounded as though a man had driven his foot through a piece of board. Mr. Martin fell senseless, and was set on by the moh, by whom he was clubbed and stoned to death. He left a wife and family, for whom much sympathy was felt. A fund was raised for them by the exertions of Henry Stubbs, Esq., J.P., of Ballyshannon, which amounted to 2791. 15s. 3d., and we are glad to say that a few days ago an additional sum of 4,0001, levied on the ratepayers of the county, was placed in trust for the victims of this cruel bereavement. Above we give an engraving of the brass tablet which is to le placed in the Parish Church of St. Anne's, Kilbarron, Ballyshannon, in memory of the Inspector. The work has been executed by Mr. Mathews, 19, Castle Street East, Oxford Street.

BY SYBARIS

THE Sybaris of old is now little more than a name, and a railway-station. Its temples and baths have vanished, like its inhabitants, their Tyrian purple and fine linen, and the delightful dinners which helped to give it its celebrity for luxuriousness. There is nothing left, except the site, and the landscape which charmed the eyes of the old Sybarites. Even these are not above suspicion. For the former is somewhat conjectural. And in a land so harassed and shattered by earthquakes, it is impossible to say with absolute assurance that the mountains and plains of to-day are the same as the mountains and plains of some two thousand odd hundred years ago.

The "buffet" of the railway-station of Sibari (the modern

The "buffet" of the railway-station of Sibari (the modern form of Sybaris), would not have greatly tempted the accomplished epicure of the ancient city. And yet it is not despicable, for southern Italy, and considering that this is only a wayside station. Town in sight there is none. Far to the north, east, and west, stretches the plain that was, and is, of proverbial fertility. Its oats and rye would do credit to Old England in a year of plenty. Higher praise for the cereals of a hot land need not be tendered. But there is much else besides oats, and, not least, the wine of Sibari. This is genuinely good liquor, and it costs but a penny the tumbler-full. While I tarry for a couple of hours at the little station, in company with some fifty other travellers of all sorts and conditions, there is brisk traffic in this deserving wine. It, more than aught else, is suggestive of the past days of the Sybarites.

The defect of the land is the scarcity of water, except in the immediate neighbourhood of the river Crati; and there, also, in summer, which, in the hot south, would dry up the very sea but for its a ueous reinforcements from the cooler north. On this little branch line from Buffaloria, on the main track between Metaponto and Reggio, water is sold in stone bottles as if it were ginger-beer. Wine is a commoner commodity. And yet this precious fluid, which the passengers gulp down so eagerly, is as soft as butter, abominably tepid, and of a colour that it would try the patience of an oil and colourman to match in his warehouse. Of its unhealthiness, there is no need to speak. The land is racked with malaria from spring to autumn; and, out of question, the water is at the bottom of it. It is probable enough there was plenty of fever here in the old days; but the Sybarites, with the blood of Greece in their veins, were less likely to be plagued by it than the meagre, half-starved, of it. It is probable enough there was plenty of lever here in the old days; but the Sybarites, with the blood of Greece in their veins, were less likely to be plagued by it than the meagre, half-starved, poorer Calabrians, whose fate it is to live here in their little thatched houses. To the ancients, a touch of the fever was probably as beneficial as a cathartic; to the moderns of Sibari, it is death, more or less speedy.

All of human suggestion that I could discover by Sibari, during my tarrying here, lay in the three or four little houses which nestled near the railway station. The station house is large, even stately, and with some beds of bright geraniums which bloom perennially round about it in this mild latitude. Behind this mansion is a paddock with a score or more of tall eucalyptus trees. There are hogs and dogs and poultry in the paddock—for the most part fast asleep in the noonday sunshine. Behind the paddock are the houses in question. Then comes the spacious green plain, and the superb cliff of Monte Pollino, rising nearly 8,000 feet directly from the plain, closes the view in the south, with its attendant limestone peaks of the southern Apennines. There could hardly be found in the world a bolder mountain than this of Pollino, or one that better shows its inches. It alone seems to justify the Sybarites in better shows its inches. It alone seems to justify the Sybarites in their choice of a building location.

These little houses were not without entertainment. They were the humblest conceivable of trattorie, or eating-houses; so humble, indeed, that even in this cheap land, where money has large indeed, that even in this cheap land, where money has large purchasing power, their proprietors found it necessary to combine other callings with that of caterer for the stomach of the public. This explained the stitching and cobbling that was in progress at the doors of the houses. The hosts made boots and breeches, while their wives supplied the rare guest with the wine of the country. For threepence it was here possible to dine in the Calabrian mode upon a jug of hearty liquor, an immense piece of rye-bread, and a dish of raw beans. Not a meal to suit a northerner, but a banquet to the Calabrian peasant. While the hungry traveller feasts in such a guise, the sated play cards on little tables set in the shade by the cobbling or stitching landlord. There is also much gossip and a power of song. Life is easy enough at Sibari to-day, though it lacks nearly every constituent part of the earlier life of Sybaris.

Each of these little one-storied houses, with a rugged floor of the lacks nearly every constituent part of the earlier life of Sybaris.

Each of these little one-storied houses, with a rugged floor of the native soil, has a room set apart for beds. Perhaps the train from Cosenza (the terminus of the little by-line from the coast into the mountains of Calabria) refuses to come to the aid of the travellers who await it at Sibari, and there is nothing for them to do except sleep. Hence these various beds placed side by side, with shrewd regard for space. A night's rest here costs only twopence halfpenny; and the houses are so near the station that at a word you may go from the sheets to the ticket-office, and catch the train, be it ever so prompt at parting.

may go from the sneets to the ticket-ornce, and catch the train, be it ever so prompt at parting.

But, for my part, I had rather saunter through a southern night, under southern stars, and with the flashing of the fire-flies round about me for lamps, than hazard my skin in a hovel of this kind. That is the worst of these warm lands of "scenic witchery." Though the sun bids you be tranquil, you have no chance of true and perfect rest. It is either fleas, flies, or ants; one or other of these active agents is sure to be told off to afflict you; and you may know at a glance which of the three has the freest welcome in may know at a glance which of the three has the freest welcome in a house of this kind.

a house of this kind.

It was evening when I left Sibari. Its fairer features had had time to stamp themselves indelibly in my mind. Our engine bore the curious, but not wholly inapt, name of "Diodorus Siculus." I had earlier in the day been drawn by the "Milo." It is pleasant to reflect that engineers and the directors of railway companies have some sort of regard for the traditions of the lands they traverse.

Over so level a tract, we could not but speed famously on our way towards the seaboard in the Gulf of Taranto. A lovelier or more soothing landscape than that of the plain of Sibari under the paling glow of evening could not easily be imagined. It was peace writ large. The hot haze of the earlier hours had vanished, and while the broad acres of ripened green were coloured with gold, the great rock of Pollino and its lesser crags were purple as a grape. great rock of Pollino and its lesser crags were purple as a grape. And thus we left them, ere their transfiguration had yielded to the more sombre shades of night.

THE CREMATORIUM AT WOKING

THE buildings of the Cremation Society of England, St. John's, Knaphill, near Woking, are very picturesquely situated, and are almost concealed by trees. The chapel, to which is attached a comfortably-furnished watting-room, is forty-eight feet long, and about twenty-four feet broad, and is provided with a furnace for public use, and a private crematorium, erected by the Duke of Bedford for his own exclusive use. The arrangements are such that the persons attending the ceremony neither see nor hear anything of the process in the furnace-chambers. At the concluding words of the funeral service the doors at the head of the bier are opened. These lead to a passage, the end of which is concealed by blind tracery. SARDINES

"No," said a late eminent naturalist and well-known inspector of fisheries, to a gentleman asking information about the sardine. "No, I cannot give you an off-hand reply; like many other questions addressed to me, yours is one of those which it is much questions addressed to me, yours is one of those which it is much easier to ask than to answer, but as regards the fish in the box we have examined, in my opinion they are immature pilchards; if so, it bears out Yarrell's idea of the pilchard being the sardine of commerce. Our own sprats, it is almost certain, might in time become quite as valuable as French sardines if similarly treated and made up for sale in dainty boxes like this one, the contents of which we have been discussing."

What a happy circumstance it would be if the expression of opinion just recorded should prove prophetic, and that in the course of a year to two we might find established, on various parts of our sea-board. an extensive and profitable cure of sprats. At present, although in most seasons wonderfully abundant, these tiny but toothsome fish do not reach our markets in such quantities as are desirable, because do not reach our markets in such quantities as are desirable, because of the places where they are captured being situated at considerable distances from populous towns and cities, whilst the rates exacted for the carriage of fresh fish are so high as to cripple sprat-fishers in their endeavours to dispose of their piscine spoils at a profit. Sprats sent, for instance, from Inverness to London, have been known not to fetch more money at Billingsgate than served to pay the cost of transit and the commission charged by the sale-men. Under such circumstances, it is surprising that some of those interested in fishery matters have not yet turned their attention to sprats and young herrings, which are often caught in the same net, with a view to the establishment of a curing industry à la Française. Beginnings in sprat-curing have been made on the English coast, but, so far as the writer knows, no details have been published of the amount or degree of success obtained.

As an incitement to exertion in the direction indicated, it may be stated that what has been so well done for so many years in

As an incitement to exertion in the direction indicated, it may be stated that what has been so well done for so many years in France has been successfully imitated in America, where a very profitable mode of curing small herrings has for some years been carried on. French sardines were at one time largely consumed in the United States, the fisher folks and the merchants of which had watched the growth of the industry with a feeling somewhat akin to jealousy, having seen the sardine trade of France increase from small beginnings till it had developed into an important branch of commerce. The sardine industry of America, which has attained great dimensions, began in a small way by the preparation of what are called "Rooshians," small herrings caught and cured in Norway by the use of spices and then pickled in vinegar. These of what are called "Rooshians," small herrings caught and cured in Norway by the use of spices and then pickled in vinegar. These sardines had reached the United States viā Germany, and were always purchased with avidity in America till the occurrence of the Franco-German War led to the export being stopped for a time. Then the "Russians" were so greatly missed that plans were at once entered upon to produce a similar article in connection with the American fisheries, but much prejudice had to be overcome before the home-cured "Russians" found a ready market. Ultimately, however, a trade was established, and the imports from the re-opened ports discontinued.

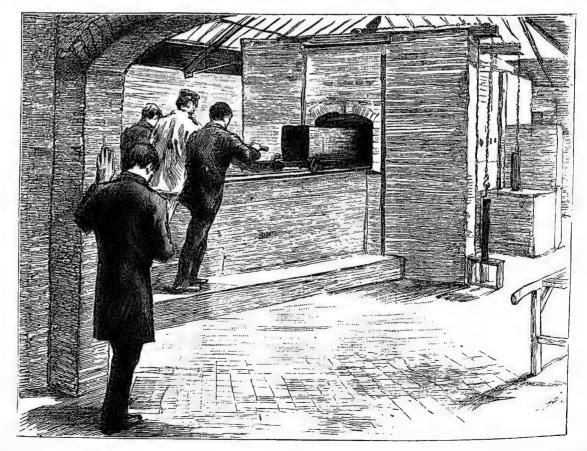

The success which attended the manufacture of "Russians" re-opened ports discontinued.

The success which attended the manufacture of "Russians" speedily attracted the attention of the more enterprising spirits among the American fish dealers, who at once began the cure of small herrings in oil in the mode of the French sardines, the value of these fish for "canning" purposes being estimated at a high figure; the initial difficulty, as is usual in all new industries, was how to manipulate the fish so well as to create a demand for them in the face of the French article which had always met a ready sale throughout the United States.

Those who most interested themselves in the formation of an American sardine industry visited Europe in order to study on the

The incineration over, the ashes are reverently swept from the floor of the chamber into an urn, or whatever receptacle may be prepared by the relations, and are either deposited in suitable niches provided in the chapel, or taken away and buried in the ordinary manner. This was the mode adopted in the case of the immediately on the arrival of the investigating party. Not, however, till many failures had occurred did the small herring of America make its début as a sardine. Imitation of the French "get-up" had to be resorted to, in order to propitiate those dealers who agreed to sell them, and in time the new curing industry grew into a big trade. It became known at the taking of the Census of the United States a few years ago that nearly thirty establishments were engaged in the preparation of sardines, and that over seven millions of small herrings were annually required to supply the demand—the value of the whole being about eight hundred thousand dollars. Probably the American trade in these homeel herrings is now much larger, but no recent statistics have

What has been done in the United States might surely be accombined in Great Britain. Of the French sardine industry many facts I figures of official value are from time to time made public. Lee demand is enormous. As many as five millions of the well-known was have been sold throughout France in seasons when the fish were pleutiful, and a much greater number has been in some years expected to other countries, but unfortunately the so-called sardines in the French coasts are occasionally the reverse of plentiful, so that the supplies of the cured fish during the last seven years have even somewhat intermittent. An elaborate official report was recently made on the disappearance of the fish about which, during laze years, there has been much controversy. It has been maintained by one or two economists that the sardine of Concarneau (one the French curing-stations) is undoubtedly the young pilchard, with which fish it has certainly much in common, the dorsal fin in the fashes being, at any rate, the centre of gravity, which is not so in the case of the herring and its congener, the sprat. Many of the loves sold as containing French sardines only have been found filled with young herrings, and also sprats. At the present time there has teen placed on the English markets plentiful consignments of herring-tails done up in the usual sardine fashion, and prepared in the same way as the genuine fish! obtained in the work of educating these "children of silence" before the seventeenth century.

In 1620 Juan Paulo Bouet, a Benedictine monk, published a work on this subject which contains a manual alphabet almost identical with the one-handed alphabet now in common use in Europe and in America. This book was of great assistance to De L'Epée, who was the first to recognise the acceptability of signs for conversation, rather than teaching, and so to establish them as a language. Born at Versailles, November 25th, 1712, the Abbé in 1765 began to occupy himself with the education of two deaf and dumb sisters, and, his attempts being crowned with success, he determined to devote his life to enabling persons similarly afflicted to hold intercourse with their fellow creatures. Not only did he invent the "deaf and dumb" alphabet, but, in 1771, he, at his own expense, founded a free school in which to teach his system. This was afterwards converted into a public institution, and received

SIR JULIUS VOGEL, K.C.M.G., who was formerly Premier of New Zealand, opens the Nineteenth Century with an article headed, "Is It Open to the Colonies to Secede?" If the whole subject, he observes, could be dispassionately considered by the master minds of the various Dominions, the advantages of Federation would be as apparent as the danger of allowing the relations of the component parts of the Empire to drift as at present. "Sadly small occurrences," he concludes, "under existing circumstances, might lead to a conflagration which would rend the Empire to its centre, and make a cordial and sympathetic union impossible."—Of one form of oppression in the dominions of the Czar, we have the story told by the Rev. C. H. Wright, D.D., entitled "Stamping Out Protestantism in Russia."—Noticeable articles are "The Dreadful Revival of Leprosy," by Sir Morell Mackenzie, and "The Awakening of Persia," by Mr. E. F. G. Law (Commercial Attaché at Teheran). With reference to this last, we may observe that the pages of the Reviews offer a good field for our Consuls abroad, the fruits of whose special information is else buried in generally unread Consular Reports.—Mr. Gladstone, in "Electoral Facts of To-Day," derives apparent pleasure in playing with by-election figures in the straightforward and ingenuous fashion which has won him the respect of judicious people with the faculty of independent perception for humbug in excelsis.

As labour is the question of the hour, considerable importance attaches to two articles in the Contemporary, one by Mr. Robert Giffen on the "Gross and Net Increase of Rising Wages," the other by Mr. Sidney Webb on "The Limitation of the Hours of Labour." Apart from the admitted improvement in the condition of the working-class now going on, it is well to bear in mind a fact emphasised by Mr. Giffen. A class may continue to exist, and even increase, in the midst of our civilisation, possibly not a large class in proportion, but still a considerable class, who are out of the improvement altogether, who are capable of nothing but the rudest labour, and who have neither the moral nor the mental qualities fitted for the strain of modern society. On the other side, the existence of what may be called a barbarian class among the capitalist classes, living in idle luxury, and not bearing the burden of society in any way, seems also a danger.—Interesting, too, are Sir T. William Dawson on "The Deluge—Biblical and Geological," and Professor Sayce on "Ancient Arabia."—Other contributors are Mr. Robert Buchanan on "The Modern Drama and Its Minor Critics," and Professor Thorold Rogers on "Oxford Professors and Oxford Tutors."

There is a time to be young and a time to be old, he tells us with some approach to platitude. Our modern society is out of gear because the lesson of nature is not obeyed. W. H. Myers. An invitation with this object in view has been issued by a group of men, the International Congress of Experimental Psychology lately held in Paris under the headship of Professors Charcot, Ribot, Richet, &c. Mr. Myers urges as a motive for aiding this inquiry that thus light may be shed on the deepest problems which can occupy mankind.—With reference to the question of national defence, there is matter for intelligent reflection in S. Mrs. E. Lynn Linton has one of her characteristically bright papers in the Universal Review on "The Ethics of Friendship.—Most interesting, perhaps, is "A Reminiscence of De Quincey," by C. Rae-Brown. He relates how a most important article of De Quincey's was only partially set up at the offices of the Mail and Tail on the day when they had to go to press. Frequent inquiries at the great essayist's lodgings being productive of no result, Mr. Rae-Brown went there. "I found," he says, "on entering De Quincey's room, that he was either uncommonly soundly asleep or in a state of stupor. He lay stretched out on the hearthrug before the parlour fire-grate, clad in an old dressing-gown, with no stockings on the feet, merely a pair of thin loose slippers over his toes." The side of United States existence which appeals to our perception of the comical is amusingly treated in Temple Bar by Mr. Arthur Montefore, under the heading "Among the Americans,"—"Jacqueline de Laguette" is the personality whose striking career is briefly and vividly portrayed in this month's portion of "The Romance of History" Series.—A critical and biographical essay on "Lord Chesterfield" is well done.

Sir George Baden-Powell, M.P., discusses "The L. S. D. of Home Rule" in the National Review. The financial effects of the experiment desired by Mr. Gladstone would be increase in public expenditure and in the burdens of taxation; a shifting those burdens from the wealthy to the poor; a loss of all elasticity in revenue, and of borrowing powers at low rates of interest.—Mr. T. Friendship is sworn between the two, and Kamal gives his boy as "brother in blood" to the Colonel's son. The whole scene is finely given, and the ballad is altogether a grand one.—Canon Ainger's "The Teaching of English Literature" is eminently useful and instructive; and very funny is "The Incarnation of Krishna Mulvaney," by Mr. Rudyard Kipling.

Blackwood opens with a statesmanlike account of the European situation, "Current Influences on Foreign Politics," by "Kurios." The writer differs entirely from Sir Charles Dilke with reference to Austria's military strength. He places a high value on the Austrian cavalry, and maintains that, in the great range of the Carpathians, Austria has a most formidable military bulwark.—Mr. John Skelton, C.B., LL.D., indites a reply to certain critics anent "The Casket Letters and Mary Stuart."

MOUSSA BEY

MOUSSA BEY

Some months ago, very serious charges—which were solemnly formulated in the Daily News by Mr Gladstone—were made against a powerful Kurdish chieftain named Moussa Bey. It is said that in March last, accompanied by a band of a hundred men, he entered the house of one Agatchian, near Moosh, shot his father, pillaged the house, and carried off the wife and daughter of the dead man. The wife died from fatigue in the snow; the girl, who was only fifteen, was forcibly compelled to become the mistress of Moussa's brother, Djaso. Subsequently, when the affair had been noised abroad, and certain gendarmes came to take the girl away from Djaso, she refused to go, saying, "I am Mussulman; leave me in peace." Ultimately the girl was given up to the Armenian Council, and Moussa was summoned to Constantinople to answer this and other charges of like nature which were brought against him. He was put on his trial on November 23rd before the Criminal Court, on two counts of the original indictment, which contained ten charges. The Public Prosecutor, Halid Bey, conducted the examination of the witnesses, of whom two only were heard at the sitting of the Court. Halid Bey's method of examination brought many a smile to the handsome countenance of the accused, and provoked manifestations of disapprobation from the audience. The demeanour of Moussa was haughty and defiant; he evidently felt that the Court was with him. Considering the amount of protection which he enjoys in high places, and the anxiety of the Sultan not to shock Islamic prejudices, it is somewhat remarkable that he has appeared at the bar of a Criminal Court. That he has so appeared is due to the unostentatious but no less determined pressure exercised by Sir William White. It was thought probable in Constantinople that, in spite of the support of his influential friends, the Kurdish chieftain would be convicted, but that his punishment would be of a lenient character. Not so, however. Despite Mr. Gladstone, despite the Daily News, despite some exceeding

THE CONDITION OF ARMENIA

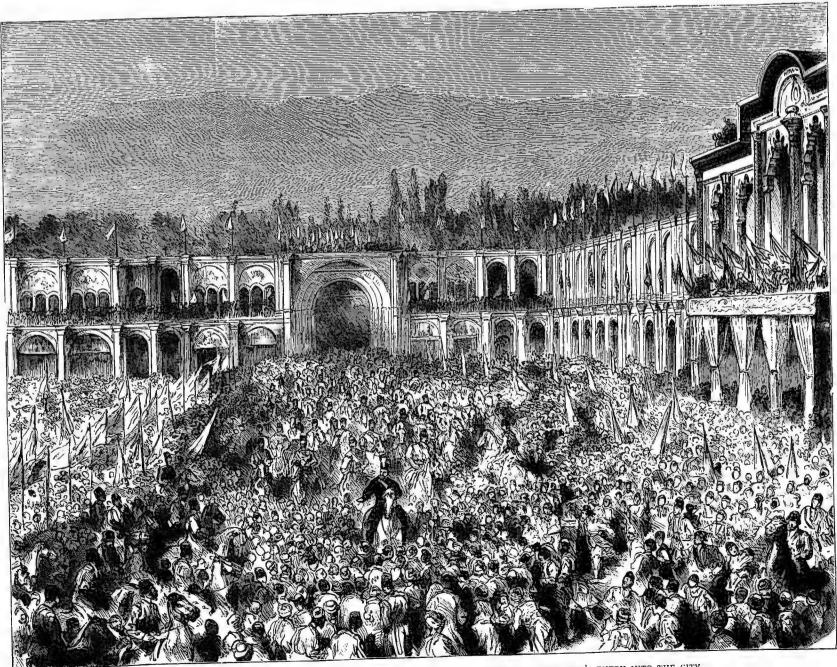

TANGIER, which is the most Europeanised town in the dominions of the Sultan of Morocco, and, like Algiers, a favourite winter resort for persons whose chests are delicate, is, or ought to be, especially interesting to Englishmen. When Charles II. married Catherine of Braganza, it formed part of her dowry, and became an English possession. We held it for twenty-two years, during which time we improved the harbour, and built a substantial mole, but the nation grew weary of the expenditure of life and money caused by the perpetual attacks of the Moors on the garrison, and when in addition it was rumoured that the said garrison formed the nucleus of an intended Popish Army, the works were destroyed, and the place abandoned to the Moors, who have held it ever since.

Viewed from the adjacent height of the Kesba, or citadel, Tangier, with its mosques, flat-roofed houses, batteries, and castellated walls, presents a formidable appearance, but a few broadsides of modern artillery would soon reduce it to ruins. On the north and west the town is sheltered from cold winds by the hill under which it lies, while the range of the Lower Atlas (visible from the Kesba) protects it from the scorching hot blasts of the desert. The view is very fine. The white glistening houses, the green foliage of the graceful palm-trees, and the intense blue of the adjacent sea, combine to make an effective picture. VIEWS IN TANGIER

The Soko, or market-place, presents an animated appearance on Sundays and Thursdays, which are the market days. The town is then filled with a motley crowd of country people, among whom may be seen specimens of the wild Riff tribes. There are throngs of camels, horses, and asses, and all kinds of farm and garden produce are sold. In the evening the Soko is the resort of story tellers and jugglers.

The Sultan's Palace is a fair specimen of Moorish architecture, but is not otherwise remarkable. The "Wandering Minstrels" here depicted are to be seen in the Soko, or in the Moorish coffee-houses, where on the matted floor men squat about smoking cigarettes and drinking black coffee.—Our engravings are from photographs by Valentine and Sons, 152 and 154, Perth Road, Dundee.

The Ecclesiastical Commissioners and the Bishop of Manchester cordially approve of the scheme, the former having offered to defray the cost of promoting the Bill, if successful, while the Bishop has made himself liable for 300l., the estimated cost of an abortive Bill. This has been so framed as to preclude the possibility of Canon Parker himself becoming the first Bishop of Burnley.

The Suffragan Bishop of Richmond, Dr. Pulleine, preaching recently at Bradford, after a football match there, strongly defended the game. His own connection with it, he said, as captain of a football team when at school, more than thirty years ago, had been instrumental in developing in him qualities which had been of essential value to him through all his subsequent career, and he owed to the position he then occupied all that he now was.

LONDON IMPRESSIONISTS

As illustrating one of the latest developments of art in England, the small exhibition just opened at Messrs. Goupil's gallery is not without interest. The vague term Impressionism in Art is open to various interpretations. Judging from the works of some of the ablest exponents of the method, it means the art of rendering, without any realistic imitation of individual fact, the aspect of anything in nature as it appeared to the artist in its entirety. what the early painters of the French school of Impressionists aimed at, and what some of them—the late E. Manet, for instance, aimed at, and what some of them—the late E. Manet, for instance, and M. Degas—successfully accomplished. Several of the works in the present collection show nothing of the individual feeling of their authors, and some of them are deliberate imitations of the work of other men. Some of Mr. George Thomson's pictures have been inspired, not by nature, but by M. Claude Monet; and nearly all those by Mr. P. W. Steer reflect the most objectionable peculiarities of the same painter's method. A prefatory note to the catalogue informs us that the sole legitimate province of Impressionism is beauty; but there are several works in the room showing the most entire disrevard of harmony of line and unity of effect. the most entire disregard of harmony of line and unity of effect, and some, which need not be named, remarkable only for their

and some, which need not be named, remarkable only for their eccentricity and bizarre extravagance.

Five or six of the best things in the collection are contributed by Mr. Théodore Roussel. His life-sized portrait of "Mrs. C. Gray Robertson" is an especially good work, more refined in style, and more delicate in its modelling of form than anything we have seen by him. Almost as good, in an entirely different way, are many of his riverside studies. "Opalescent Evening, Chelsea" and "The Plumbago Works," are perhaps the best, but they all show close observation and a true sense of colour. The pictures of Mr. Bernhard Sickert are of very unequal merit, but two or three of them, especially his sketch of the outside of a little French café, called "The Waitress," and the low-toned study, "The Cinder Path" are thoroughly artistic renderings of picturesque subjects. A few picturesque street-scenes by Mr. Paul F. Maitland well deserve notice. So also do many fresh and suggestive landscape sketches and two or three studies of flowers in water colours by Mr. sketches and two or three studies of flowers in water colours by Mr.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF PAINTERS IN WATER-COLOURS

Francis E. James.

THE Winter Exhibition at the Gallery in Pall Mall East suffers from the absence of several artists whose works have formed especially attractive features in recent displays. A considerable proportion of the very numerous sketches and studies however deserve attention, and there are a few finished drawings of great excellence. One of the most important—Mr. Henry Wallis's "The Sick King of Bokhara," suggested by a poem by Matthew Arnold—if not remarkable as realisation of dramatic incident, is an excellent picture, conveying a vivid impression of the clear atmosphere and glowing colour of the East. While the characteristic and well-grouped figures and all the details of the rich Oriental architecture are rendered with real stic truth, every individual fact bears its right relative value to the rest. Mr. H. R. Robertson's large drawing, "The Khan, Asad Pasha, Damascus," is true in local colour and wrought in every part with elabour that has been lavished on it. The composition is confused, and the figures want vitality. "Wonderland" is the title given by Mr. J. H. Henshall to an unconventional and, in many respects excellent, portrait of a contemplative little girl. The figure is not well proportioned, but the attitude is childlike, and the reflected light and colour on the expressive face and tangled golden hair are admirably rendered. Sir John Gilbert's romantic forest-scene, with armed horsemen and gipsies picturesquely grouped together in the foreground "The Sonnet," is an excellent example of his familiar manner of treating subjects of the kind—harmonious in composition and colour, large in style, and impressive.

Of many landscape studies by Mr. Thorne Waite, the first in order of arrangement, "Hungerford Marsh," strikes us as the best. This artist always depicts the permanent features of his subjects with force and convincing fidelity, but his skies are often rather thin and papery. This work is remarkable for its fulness of tone and excellent keeping as a whole not less than for its accurate delineation of form and spaciousness of effect. None among the finished landscapes has a stronger claim to attention than Mr. Matthew Hale's view "On the Moors Above Bolton Abbey" by twilight. The glow of warm light from the setting on the misty hill tops is admirably rendered, and the subtle modulation of tone in the richly-wooded foreground, indistinctly seen in the gathering gloom, are equally beautiful and true. Mr. Alfred Fripp's luminous sea-coast view, "From the Point at Lulworth," Mr. J. W. North's "Cherry Trees in Autumn," and Mr. Herbert Marshall's view of "Westminster Abbey from Lambeth," seen through a foggy atmosphere, illuminated by red sunset light, though presenting no novel feature, are excellent works. Among many outdoor studies by the last-named artist, "The Cheese Market, Alkmaar," crowded with figures, and the smaller "Haarlem," are especially noteworthy for their picturesque character and the impression of movement and by the last-named artist, "The Cheese Market, Alkmaar," crowded with figures, and the smaller "Haarlem," are especially noteworthy for their picturesque character and the impression of movement and bright daylight that they convey. Mr. S. J. Hodson's large finished drawing of the "Piazza dei Signori, Verona," like all his works of the kind, is marked by truth of local character and correct architectural draughtsmanship, and is more luminous in colour, stronger in style, and more complete than anything we have seen by him. Mr. Marks has a capital drawing of a "Sulphur Crested Cockatoo," and a very characteristic little study of a seventeenth-century Puritan, seated with an expression of perplexity on his face, entitled "Doubt." The very small studies contributed by Mr. Albert Goodwin are of strangely unequal value. Most of them Albert Goodwin are of strangely unequal value. Most of them show excellent taste in selection of subject and point of view, and a few are distinguished by harmony of composition and refinement of colour. As a truthful rendering of atmospheric effect the breezy sketch of "Clovelly" is very much the best.

AN AUSTRALIAN ALMANAC

LET us suppose Time's hour-glass to be not only suddenly reversed, but that by some means the months should henceforth be made to proceed backwards; that January should become July, that April should stand for "chill October," that the merry month of May should be the most dismal month of the year, and the days continue to shorten instead of lengthen, until the 21st of June registered the shortest day in the year. And then imagine the mental dislocation, the topsy-turveydom of ideas that would ensue here, with the times thus put out of joint!

Yet such are the months, according to the Australian Almanac of the southern hemisphere. Picture the discomfiture of the littérateur; or the journalist from home, charged to the throat with apt quotation; or the misery of the unprofessional scholar who knows nothing of the auri sacra fames, to whom the love of books is a passion, LET us suppose Time's hour-glass to be not only suddenly of the auri sacra fames, to whom the love of books is a passion, whose mind is saturated with the best poetic literature, ancient and modern; one to whom the quaint imagery of our Elizabethan poets and the music of our sweetest singers—not all "the idle singers of an idle day"—is alike familiar. It will be necessary for him to lead mentally a double existence if he would continue to enjoy his favourite authors and escape a purgatory of dislocated metaphors, inverted similes, and personifications turned inside out.

A new arrival, when once he fully realises the position, will gaze A new arrival, when once he fully realises the position, will gaze around him at his small, well-selected library in despair. Even the winds, he finds, have crossed over, and changed places! There is perhaps a north wind blowing, suggestive of "Cease, rude Boreas, blustering railer," &c. But the north wind is here a hot wind, with a fiery heat which scorches the cheek, bringing clouds of dust and flies, and suffocating blasts like the air from a fiery furnace. Kingsley's address to the "North-East Wind" reads like a parody, and Shelley's ode to the "Wild West Wind" is a midsummer madness. The verse of the American poet, with fevered brow

Fanned by the kisses of the soft south-west, excites a gruesome smile, for the south wind comes straight across the Antarctic from the South Pole, and freezes the lips into silence. It is clear that, henceforth, George Herbert, or Keats, or any of the poets who have immortalised certain months and seasons, will be poets who have immortalised certain months and seasons, will be foolishness if read in their due season, and such books as Keble's "Christian Year" had perhaps better be given up altogether.

Remembering since Oxford days the gentle music—no epic strain—of that author's lucid word-pictures, which sometimes in intervals of strenuous work fell upon the weary brain with a soothing influence more welcome than heroic verse, he, with lingering delight, opens yet once more the familiar pages at random. The time is — let it be remarked — November! the month when the first great burst of heat is felt in Australia. At the top of the page he has thus opened he slowly reads page he has thus opened he slowly reads-

Red o'er the forest peers the setting sun,
The line of yellow light dies fast away,
That crown'd the eastern copse; and chill and dun Falls on the moor the brief November day.

As he reads through this inimitable late autumn picture he wipes the perspiration from his brow, and quickly closes the book.

Like the trees imported from Europe, which for a few seasons make a ludicrous muddle of it, but in time settle down to blossoming in September, and bringing forth their fruit at Christmas, he succeeds at length in becoming accustomed to topsy-turveydom, though he is never quite reconciled to the celebration of Easter in though he is never quite reconciled to the celebration of Easter in the autumn, when the mellow light of the fast-shortening days, and the hectic hues of the imported English trees, proclaim "the sunset of the year," and suggest thoughts and images alien to those appropriate to the time; while to accept Whitsuntide in winter, when the winds are piping a shrill blast, seems only a lesser outrage than the roast beef and smoking hot plum-pudding which all courageous Britons indulge in during the blasing her of Christ rage than the roast beer and smoking not plum-pudding which are courageous Britons indulge in during the blazing heat of Christmas, though the temperature be 114 deg. in the shade. With equal courage is the Christmas pantomime attended on Boxing Day, and in the steaming atmosphere of crowded houses, young and old sit it out unflinchingly, even to the last bad joke, the last flicker of the footlights.

However, the first shock over, the new comer may be said to resemble Kinglake's English groom in "Eöthen," who, when once the boundary line of Christendom was crossed, went on with set face and compressed lips, "as if prepared for anything—Death, or the Koran, or plurality of wives." And closer acquaintance with things antipodean will reveal meant the set of the compression of the compressi Koran, or plurality of wives." And closer acquaintance with things antipodean will reveal many other interesting and curious anomalies not so obvious to those to the manner born.

not so obvious to those to the manner born.

But, after all, the sotto-sopra condition of the Australian Almanac becomes most apparent at Christmastide, when the Midsummer holidays take place. The Houses of Parliament are formally prorogued by the Governor—the Law Courts closed—and the University men go "up" (country), not "down," for the Long Vacation. Like the rest of the world, you go away from the city's heat and noise on some colonial tour—every one goes, the heat is tropical. You perhaps go to the seaside, or to the Australian Alps tropical. You perhaps go to the seaside, or to the Australian Alps—really well-wooded ranges—glancing across the Valley of the Jordan, en route, or across to Tasmania, a favourite holiday ground, the Isle of Wight, or rather the Jersey or Guernsey, of the Antithe Isle of Wight, or rather the Jersey or Guernsey, of the Anttpodean Colonies. But you have not quite done with subversive shocks! The summer weather, and the uninterrupted leisure of railway travelling, disposes you to slumber, when you are suddenly awakened by a railway porter shouting "Jericho," as the train enters a country station. After composing yourself, you probably doze again until at another station the startling cry of "Jerusalem" wakes you effectually. At another stage, as you gaze from the carriage windows at the scenery, a fellow-passenger courteously informs you that the train is skirting the Lake of Tiberias! And then you remember you are in Topsyturveydom. then you remember you are in Topsyturveydom.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD having had under consideration the "great and pressing question," as Mr. Ritchie terms it, of the dwellings of the labouring classes, has issued circular-letters to local authorities in London and to sanitary authorities throughout the country, detailing and urging them to act on the statutory powers which they already possess for effecting "a very material improvement in the condition of these dwellings."

"a very material improvement in the condition of these dwellings."

Mr. Justice Stephen, according to a contemporary, recently declared that whenever he saw the warning "trespassers will be prosecuted," he made a point of disregarding it, and going on the forbidden part. If he did say this, probably he wished to aid in dispelling the common belief that an ordinary trespasser can be "prosecuted." In point of fact, the owner's only remedy is a civil action, and the only possible punishment for ordinary trespass is payment for damage done to the land trespassed on, which, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, is nothing at all.

This effect is produced by a process which the plaintiff claimed to have invented. Without calling on the defendants' counsel, the Judge refused the application, remarking that every schoolboy must have practised the process in question. This in itself was enough to dispose of the motion. Moreover, there was evidence that it had been actually used in public a long time since.

DR. BARNARDO has been again called on to bring into Court a child admitted into one of his homes, and afterwards sent with his sanction out of the country. This time it was a boy, found homeless and miserable in the streets of Folkestone. His mother, less and miserable in the streets of Folkestone. His mother, residing at Leamington, assented to his reception into Dr. Barnardo's Home, but subsequently, she being a Roman Catholic, a wish was expressed in her name that he should be transferred to a Roman Catholic Home. Nevertheless, Dr. Barnardo consigned the boy to the care of a gentleman who offered to adopt him, and of whose whereabouts he knew only that he lived in Quebec, Lord Coleridge and Lord Justice Bowen—the former animadverting severely on Dr. Barnardo's conduct—have ordered a writ of habeas corpus to issue, making it, however, returnable in three months, so as to give Dr. making it, however, returnable in three months, so as to give Dr. Barnardo time to find and produce the boy. Since this decision Dr. Barnardo, in a communication to the Press, has disparaged the Dr. Barnardo, in a communication to the Press, has disparaged the character, moral and parental, of the mother, saying that he did not believe her ostensible application for the transfer of the boy to a Roman Catholic home to have been bona fide. He added that the father lived and died a Wesleyan Methodist, and his surviving relatives declared that he had wished the boy to be brought up in his own faith.

Evidence was given by the unfortunate husband and father, who has been for many years a clerk in the employment of Messrs. Spottiswoode, to the effect that she was a good wife and devoted mother, but for the last twelve months had been restless, sleepless, and very depressed in consequence of the loss of a favourite child. FREE LIBRARIES rapidly increase in London. The Central Public Library just opened at Kensington is the third established within the district, a library in Ladbroke Grove being available for North Kensington or Notting Hill, and another in Charleville Grove for South Kensington and Brompton. The two latter have about 10,000 volumes between them, while the Central Library at present contains 6,000 with plenty of room for more. The Central present contains 6,000, with plenty of room for more. Turning to South London, the libraries in Lambeth parish are so much appreciated that the Commissioners want to raise electric light. Turning to South London, the libraries in Lambeth parish are so much appreciated that the Commissioners want to raise the rate from ½d. to 1d., to provide more books and more r.om. A site and buildings, close to Brixton Station, are promised if this advance is obtained, besides 10,000l. for a library in North Lamleth, and suitable quarters for yet another, to be devoted to the joint use of Lambeth and Camberwell. South Londoners also are appealing for 4,000l., to build a spacious Fine Art Gallery near Cami erwell Vestry Hall, to house the collection in the present temporary gallery. The site is already acquired.

"HI! Tumble up! It's four o'clock, and your turn to run up the horses."

A spasmodic hammering upon the thin wooden partition that separates me from the station storekeeper—and again all is still. My "rude awakener" has himself sunk back into slumber. I strike a match and look at my watch. It is not four o'clock—it is barely three-thirty. I have a good mind to shout through to that fellow next door what I think of him and his principles, and startle him. But I think better of that. It is my turn to run up the horses; they are to be in the yard at half-past four, ready for the start at five sharp. Since I am a bit slow, as new chums will be (I am not three months "out from home," nor have I been as many weeks on the station), perhaps, after all it's better to get up now—though that's no excuse for Brown's lie. Brown, the storekeeper, is my fellow novice; we are companions in probation; we are both of us learning the business of the bush, and buying our "colonial experience." But Brown has the immense advantage (in the bush) of being an Australian by birth, while I am a poor ignorant the bush) of being an Australian by birth, while I am a poor ignorant Englishman.

I slip into my moleskin trousers and Crimean shirt by candlelight; for though the month, January, corresponds with your English July, the midsummer day out here breaks much later, as well as more suddenly. It is not until I have saddled and bridled the night-horse, and the slip-rails are down in the yard, and I am

A DAY OF MY LIFE ON A SHEEP-STATION riding out, that I shiver at the first cool touch of morning. Yet, before I reach the horse-paddock gate, not a quarter of a mile distant, the bright Southern stars have gone out, and the warm before I reach the horse-paddock gate, not a quarter of a fille distant, the bright Southern stars have gone out, and the warm purple night has changed to chill grey dawn.

The horse-paddock is always among the smallest on the "run" — though our smallest paddocks would be vast enough in the old country. This one is two miles by one and a half. Some dozen horses were turned adrift here last night. I have to find them, one and all—"muster" them—and run them up in one mob into the horse-yard. Ha! there are three, to begin with, standing grey and motionless against yonder dark line of scrub; and here, close to the fence, is Barmaid, our manager's trim roan mare. With time and patience, and a most vigilant use of the good eyesight with which I am fortunately endowed, I discover the rest in other corners of the paddock. Then I band my forces, and, with the beat of many hoofs thundering out from the midst of a flying cloud of yellow sand, I manage to yard my mob without mischance—as it happens. For a few minutes ago, if the truth will out, I nearly did have an accident, and one of an ignominious kind. I brought out my stock-whip, meaning to wield it for practice in the privacy of this early hour; but only succeeded in winding the long lash round my horse's neck at the very first flourish, occasioning a series of "pig-jumps" whereby I was very nearly unseated.

It is precisely four-thirty as I step into the verandah, where Brown is buckling his leggings; "the boss" joins us, and congratulates me drily upon my punctuality; and, on the whole, I feel rather grateful to Brown for his taradiddle of an hour ago.

We don't waste much time over breakfast. The meal was laid ready over-night—even to the tea, which has been drawing under its cosy these six hours, and makes up in potency what it has lost in heat. Time, you see, is precious this morning. We have a tremendous day before us. We are first to muster all the sheep that are in the largest paddock we have, where the water has suddenly run too low for safety; and then I and another are to drive the entire mob to an out-station thirty miles away. The mustering will take five of us the whole morning, and the droving will occupy with take the two days.

Breakfast over, we go out and find two of the regular pound-a-week hands saddling their horses in the yard. One of them—a tall, strong young fellow, with an Irish name but an unmistakable strong young fellow, with an Irish name but an unmistakable Australian accent—proceeds to strap in front of his saddle a long, neat cylinder of blue blanket. He is to be my companion en route with the sheep to the out-station. I get a blanket from my room and follow his example, for we are to camp together to-night in the open; but I fear that my blue cylinder—my "swag," to use the bush term—has less "style" about it than his, and betrays the 'prentice hand. We all carry canvas water-bags, well filled, and small packages of eatables; while Pat has slung to his saddle a "billy" in which to brew the tea at our bivouac.

The five of us ride forth abreast, as far as the gate of the huge readdock where our work is waiting for us; and here we separate.

The live of us file total across, as the as the gate of the huge paddock where our work is waiting for us; and here we separate. The paddock comprises some forty square miles. Each man is to pursue his allotted line across country, muster all the sheep that come within range of his vision, drive them straight down to the Good Complexion! AND Nice Hands!

OTHING adds so much to personal attractions as a bright, clear complexion, and a soft skin. Without them the handsomest and most regular features are but coldly impressive, whilst with them the plainest become attractive; and yet there is no advantage so easily secured. The regular use of a properly prepared Soap is one of the chief means; but the Public have not the requisite knowledge of the manufacture of Soap to guide them to a proper selection, so a pretty box, a pretty colour, or an agreeable perfume too frequently outweighs the more important consideration, viz.: the Composition of the Soap itself, and thus many a good complexion is spoiled which would be enhanced by proper care.

A most Eminent Authority on the Skin,

Professor Sir Erasmus Wilson, R.R.S.,

Writes in the JOURNAL OF CUTANEOUS MEDICINE:-

THE use of a good Soap is certainly calculated to preserve the Skin in "health, to maintain its complexion and tone, and prevent its falling into wrinkles. PEARS is a name engraven on the memory of the oldest inhabitant; and PEARS' Transparent SOAP is an article of the "nicest and most careful manufacture, and one of the most refreshing and agreeable of halms for the Skin." "and agreeable of balms for the Skin."

TO persons whose skin is delicate or sensitive to changes in the weather, winter or summer, PEARS' TRANSPARENT SOAP is invaluable, as, on account of its emollient, non-irritant character, Redness, Roughness and Chapping are prevented, and a clear appearance and soft velvety condition maintained, and a good, healthful and attractive complexion ensured. Its agreeable and lasting perfume, beautiful appearance, and soothing properties, commend it as the greatest luxury and most elegant adjunct to the toilet.

Testimonial from

Madame Adelina Patti.

There we are all to re-assemble, and from that point Pat and I are to set out with the mustered mob. At any rate, by then we shall be eight miles nearer the out-station than we are now, the paddock we are entering being not far short of that length—that will leave twenty-two miles to traverse with the sheep—and not a drop of water for the first sixteen!

The line that I am'to take is sufficiently direct and simple—even for me. I am merely to keep the eastern fence in sight on my left for me. I am merely to keep the eastern fence in sight on my left hand, follow it down to the corner, and bear along the south fence as far as the tank. At the tank I shall, in all likelihood, fall in with either Pat or the "boss," who are both taking a central course with either Pat or the "Doss," who are both taking a central sacross the paddock.

"There'll be no scrub to bother you when you once get the fence in sight," the "boss" tells me. "You'll cross the very best bit of the paddock, where the salt-bush is still green; and the odds are you'll come across more sheep than any of us."

Cut adrift from the rest, I make for my fence with that exaggerated feeling of personal responsibility which is the new chum's severest incubus. The sun rises over the dark green scrub on the left. It Cut adrift from the rest, I make for my fence with that exaggerated feeling of personal responsibility which is the new chum's severest incubus. The sun rises over the dark green scrub on the left. It is a dull red disc this morning, which one can bear to look upon—not the usual blinding pool of flashing gold. There is a slight haze in the air. The early morning is oppressive. What will the day be later on? I remember, with foreboding, that yesterday the thermometer in our verandah stood at 116 deg. in the shade; and yesterday there was wind; and to-day, it seems, there is to be none.

Three hours have passed. In front of me is a nice, orderly mob, not less than three hundred strong, moving briskly towards the tank over yonder, in the yellow distance. I have nothing to be ashamed of; I could swear to it that I have not overlooked a solitary sheep on the way—in fact, I imagine that I have done my part of the mustering rather well.

These "tanks" are nothing more than great rectangular excavations with sloping sides. They are, of course, wholly dependent upon the rainfall; and, as luck has it, I am entering upon my station experience in a season of the direst drought, when tank after tank is running dry. The immediate danger, in this instance, is the bogging of sheep in the mud from which the water has receded.

Pat is at the tank before me. His sheep are drinking as though their lives depended upon it—as indeed they do; and mine join them.

"We'll fill up our water-bags, too," says Pat." We'll need all we can carry. When we've finished this lot, not another drop can we get till near midnight! And my dog Skipper'll want it more than us two. He's got to do more half the work; and a dog knocks up quicker than anything."

Our horses, of course, take a long, deep pull, and then we push on together with our allied flock. "The rest have been to the water," says Pat. "We'll find 'em at the gate. But the boss and his mob can't be so very far ahead."

Nor is he. For presently we espy the boss coming towards us—but not wit his mob can't be so very far ahead."

Nor is he. For presently we espy the boss coming towards us—but not with sheep, and not on horseback. He is leading his roan mare, Barmaid, and another man is in the saddle—a man whose appearance startles us when we draw nearer. His clothes are covered with dirt and dust, his eyes are wild and bright; his white, ravenous face is daubed with crusted blood.

"Here, with your water-bag, you fellows—quick!" the manager shouts to us; and I canter to them with mine. The man in the saddle sways with excitement; his eyes dilate and glitter with the excerness of a wild animal; he raises the mouthniere to his lips.

eagerness of a wild animal; he raises the mouthpiece to his lips, tilts the bag with trembling hands, and drinks—drinks as though he would never stop. I guess instinctively what has happened, even before the boss comes to my side and tells me.

"Bushed!" he whispers. "A rabbiter from the next station—been lost two days. I found him by the merest chance. My own wa er-bag leaks, and there was only a drop n it when I found him; which was lucky, or he would have done himself harm—he can drink as much as he likes now. You see that blood round his lips? It's the blood of his dog! It has kept him alive!"

We take the poor fellow to the gate, and there set him on his legs, and on the track to the home-station. He is now able to mutter thanks; but at first he was unable to articulate a syllable! It is not a very inspiriting incident for us who are about to cross the most barren patch of country in the whole district!

The sheep are counted at the gate; eleven hundred and odd, in all; and Pat and I and Skipper set the great flock in motion.

It is past twelve o'clock. The sun is strong enough now, and there is still no wind. The heat is intense. And we have entered the very worst ten-mile block ever surveyed and fenced! The block has long been abandoned by man and beast; for the simple reason that it has not a drop of water, nor two acres together clear of scrub, within its four fences. Its hundred square miles are entirely overgrown with low-sized scrub, and that of the very worst kind—thick-growing mallee, interspersed with an abominable spiky bush known as "porcupine." There are, it is true, belts of pine; but where there are pines you must bargain for a sandhill or two; and nothing can be worse than sandhills, when you are driving sheep in the fierce heat of an Australian summer's day.

Our mob has soon spread itself out through the scrub, and extends over hundreds of yards. Under every tree a do en tire! wretches are "camping;" and not an inch will they budge un il they are forced on one by one. I am at the tail end of the mob, shouting myself hoarse; Pat is at the head, and, though I cannot see him, I hear him bellowing at the sheep without intermission; and, as for Skipper, he is up and down first one flank, then the other. Do what we will, 't is impossi his first drink. At the end of an nour Pat thinks that we have not travelled more than a mile, and I agree with him.

"We'd better camp 'em for a spell," says Pat, and I agree to that, too, very readily.

We are in a long, shallow, sandy gully, timbered with pine-trees. Here we round up our mob, and dismount, and eat and smcke; and presently we stretch ourselves out, and sleep for an hour in the shade of the sheltering pines, while the sheep lie scattered down the gully.

Before three we are in the saddle again, and alas! have swallowed our last dram of water; besides Skipper, it must be remembered that the lost man drank deep of our store this morning. On again. The scrub becomes denser, the sheep more difficult to move; our throats are lined by the penetrating cloud of sand and dust in which we ride; our lips are parched and painful, our voices are harsh as the cries of famished ravens; we are enduring agonies of thirst; the sun is flaying the skin from my bare arms—Pat's are copper-coloured and well seasoned.

"Five miles more," at last he tells me, and I groan aloud. We are but half-way across this square block of wilderness.

"Chew sticks," Pat goes on, seeing my evil case and proffering his advice; "chew leaves, chew twigs, chew anything! Anything's better than nothing. And, look here, mister! when the sun goes down we'll 'travel'—for the first time!"

He preves to be right on both points. I chew bits of leaves and twigs assiduously for the rest of the afternoon, and not without a degree of relief. The sun goes down. Man, horse, dog, and sheep—all alike—we pluck up fresh courage, and on we go, winding up through the interminable scrub, climbing the sandy ridges, only to plunge afresh into the dark-green sea of mallee, lying without a breath of wind to stir its leafy crests—sombre, silent, desolate. "There are brush yards at the fence," says Pat, when next we come together.

I knew there were, but it is cheerful to be reminded of the fact.

Perhaps Pat means it to be so.

"There's no water there, though," he goes on to admit; "we'll have to ride three mile for our drink, and three mile back."

"How about the sheep?" I mechanically ask; for my thoughts, I fear, are all of myself and those six miles at the end of this hard day.

"The sheep?" Let 'em rig till to mean and the service of the sheep?" I be the sheep?" I store the sheep?

"The sheep? Let 'em rip till to-morrow! Sheep can—men, mokes, and dogs can't! But cheer up, mister; to-morrow 'll be an easy day. Lots o' water to-morrow; we'll sleep in a hut to-morrow night. I say! Them yards 'll heave in sight in another minute!'

In sight! How we came through this wilderness in broad day-light is a mystery to me, but now we have only the stars to see by. One thing I know—I have had nothing to do with it. Pat has been pilot. Pat has been everything. Pat has proved himself a good fellow; and I have been—a new chum, perhaps; yet giving good work for my "rations," I dare aver!

Skipper, who has been in a bad way for some hours, pulls himself together for the yarding-up, when at last the welcome moment comes. When the last sheep is secure for the night, and the gate shut, we turn our undivided anxieties to our parched and burning throats, with the result that we are swiftly in our saddles again. throats, with the result that we are swiftly in our saddles again. The three miles canter to the well Pat wots of is a relief after the long day's monotonous stock-riding. We reach the well; we leap from our horses; we let down the bucket that is there; and then—and then—words fail me!

The two men, the two horses, and the dog—we drink in turn from the bucket, and drink again, until we are satisfied. What can have been the sensation of that poor fellow this morning if his first long drink was much sweeter than these sweet draughts of ours? At last our thirst is slaked—even down to Skipper's—and we ride At last our thirst is slaked—even down to Skipper's—and we ride back to the yards with full water-bags and big appetites. How good is the damper and mutton! how refreshing each new draught of pure, cold water! For—alas for the romance of the typical bivouac! neither of us has the energy to make a fire—by mutual consent we have foregone tea; we hanker only for our saddles—as pillows for our weary heads. And at last we do take off our boots, and delve cunning hollows for our hips, and roll ourselves in our blue blankets, and lie down to rest under the pale-blue stars, with a final half-pipe of peace in our mouths. It is high time; it is twelve o'clock, and, allowing liberally for the spell in the pine-tree gully, we have been seventeen hours in the saddle to-day! My own pipe soon slips from between my teeth. The last sound I hear is Pat's nasal drawl, punctuated by the puff contemplative:—
"Never you mind! It won't be a day like this to-morrow,

"Never you mind! It won't be a day like this to-morrow, mister. To-morrow—lots o' water. To-morrow—tea, hot from the billy. To-morrow—square meals. To-morrow night a roof over our heads; but to-morrow morning—up at four!"

He is a good fellow, Pat, though he will take the gilt off the gingerbread. All day he has been doing his level best to be encouraging. I suspect him of entertaining a kind of rugged pity for the new chum.
